When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to send him the remewes of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his mouables, at his owne pleasure: not without giuing hope, to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good mood, like enough it is, that Dion would haue bene well pleased to liue well, as hee did at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby vrged him to take another course, euen to seeke the restitution of his Countrey to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberality, had purchased much loue in Greece. This loue made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant : but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose helpe he might reume into Sicily. Yet hee got not aboue eight hundred (for hee carried the matter closely) to follow him in this aduerture. But many of them were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did hee doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needefull, that would readily assist him. Therefore hee landed boldly in Sicily, marched to Syracuse, entered the Citie without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, saue the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie, but hee quickly had aduertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recouer the Towne, hee was faine to depart, leaving yet the Castele to the custody of Apollonates his eldest son. Yet ere hee went, his Minion Philistus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beate, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Estates. Hee was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himselfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great ioy. Soone after his departure from Syracuse, new troupes enter the Castele: they fallie out, assaile, spoyle, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere hee could arrive, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Townesmen, thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Castele sallie againe, with greater furie then euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Childe, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the second time to their succour; the loue of his Countrey surmounting all the iniuries that hee had receiued. Hee sets upon the Garrison of the Castele, with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire every where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after hee had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had wel-neere burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, hee recovered the Castele, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollonates, after Dionysius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved, and whom he had loued most, gaue an vntimely end to his dayes. For he was soon after this his victory, murdered by Gylippus, who, after he had, with ill success, awhile governed Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italie, recouers his estate, and returns to Syracuse, driving Nysius thence, whom he found Go- uernour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing, more then euer, his cruelty, flee to Ictes, a Syracusan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Ictes enters into con- sideracie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not onely to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being desferuently afflicted on all sides, send to the Corin- thians for succour. Ictes also sends thither, and dissuades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the businesse. He tels them, by his messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armie in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Ictes, more enraged then dissuaded, send Timoleon with ninetene Gallies, to deliuer Syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Ictes had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, diuen Dionysius into the Castle, where he besieged him.

Ictes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather fought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliuer his Countrey. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet, for that all things were in effect estab- lished in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium; whole Captaines desired Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, then he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vsed to him in priuate; that he might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victory, obtained by a fewe few words, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleon's desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the preasse; and hauing fewe saille, before the Gares were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was ioyfully receiued by Andromachus the Gouvernour. From thence he marched toward Abraham, were surprizing Ictes his Armie, he slue a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victory to beget friends. The Adranians ioyned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeelde vp himselfe, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Ictes, whom he dissuaded, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fittie daies, after his arrival, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to liue there a priuate man, was still invaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Ictes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are staied in Italie by foule weather. Ictes is strengthened with threecore thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fittie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Car- thaginians had dominion within the wals of that Citie. With this great Armie, Ictes assaulteth the Castle. Timoleon sends them victuals, and succour, in small boates, by night, from Catana. Mago and Ictes doe therefore resolute to besiege Catana, but they were no sooner on the ir way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Corin- thians, sallied out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Mago abandoned Ictes, being being frightened out of Sicil (which he might easily haue conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of farther punishment, he hanged him- selfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and bears downe the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie when the strangers were fled, in effect de- solate; so as their horses did feede on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Island.

But a new storme ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybaum, with threecore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their prouisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a Riuer.

A tempest of raime, haile, and lightning, with boysterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are vterly broken: ten thousand slaine, fise thousand taken; withall their carriages and prouisions: among which there were found a thousand cor- dres, gilt and grauen. After this Timoleon, gaue an ouerthrow to Ictes, and following his victory,ooke him, with his son Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Ictes his wiues and daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Ictes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arste, Dion's wife and a yong child of his, with Aristamache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

Hegaine preuailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it selfe. Mamercus fled to Hiippa Tyrant of Messena; but Timoleon, pursuing him, won the towne, deli- uering Hiippa to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition, That they should not passe the Riuer of Lycus. After this, he liued in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnely buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funerals, being for euer ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Island; the inhabitants enioyed their libertie in peace, about twentie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie; and the Labouring man enioyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey, which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

Twentie yeares after the death of Timoleon, there flatted vpon Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of base condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degre to degre, rising to be a Prator; finally, became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ran, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the Principalltie. For hee had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable seruice: and on the contrary, as memorable seruice for the Margantines, against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Margantia, and made Generall of their forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so brightly, that the Citizens were driuen to craue aide, euen from their ancient and ne- cessary enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace betwene himselfe and the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the State of Carthage, for euer after. Amilcar entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betwene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prator; he entertaines fise thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Margantines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie also being di- uided into many factions) hee assailes the Senators, kils all his enemies and opposites, diuides the spoile of the rich, among the poore; and giues liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to rauenish, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controulement: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the wals: their furie had no further subiect to worke on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent sicknesse, by which the common wealth was vterly consumed, he found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had administered; and that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democratie, by which it had bene gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glory and prosperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For as he knew, that he had left none liuing, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had bene partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, saluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had bene giuen to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but the one was of bafe, the other of Kingly parents; the one took liberty from a Common-weale; the other fought only to succede in a Monarchie; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the other, after hee had obtained the Crowne, fought, by making good lawes, to recouer the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iustine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the summe whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him six thousand men to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that he did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vex and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that he should reduce all Sicily into such termes as would make it become; as an easie prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punicke faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meere falsehood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redresse. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africke, and a new Captain appointed to succede in his charge, with such forces as might compell Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not harken to it. All this tended, to saue their Confederates, from suffering such iniuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it fruerly punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutiny: the suffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and so referred, vntill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had soone notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrey. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusians, as gaue him not onely means to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authority, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custome of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices, thinking to deale subtilly, and finely, that spin their threads so small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilcar saw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked deuiCES: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into so much the greater extremities, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which some of his fore-goers had taught him; and, for feare of such a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what sort he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar serued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. Hee saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolved to get the start of them in action. Hee dissembled no longer; but, in stead of spoile and robbery, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicily his owne; ere the

Carthaginians

Carthaginian forces arttued: which thinking to haue encountered an ill-established Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them sharpe entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Naue was so Tempest-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their businesse vndone, and returne into Africke.

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, euen whilest it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the sonne of Gisco, gathering together the remainders of this ship-wracke, was bold to passe ouer into Sicily, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathocles was soone readie to examine the cause of their coming. Many skirmishes passed betwene them, in which (commonly) the Syracusian had the better. But his good successe begat presumption; whereby hee lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduerser chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not vpheld by great circumspection. The war was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed vp, and driuen to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be iudged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new Tyrannie, were (for the most part) such, as had bene either mercenary Souldiers, infranchised slaues, or bafe & needie people; helpers in establishing the present Government, and Executioners of the murders, and spoyle, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well obserued, and (withall) so fearefull, that they durst not stirre. But it was enough, that they agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; Famine was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessity, Agathocles aduertured vpon a strange course, which the euent commended as wise. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Hauen; and committing the government of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had bethought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the besieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was ready to depart, aduertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with cofee, and other provisions, were drawing neere vnto Syracuse. To intercept these, the Carthaginians hoist saile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not farr gone, when they might behold Agathocles, issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuallers. Heereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their coming, nor fled backe into the Citie, but made all speed towards Africke; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would giue them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten to Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceiued; first, that by pursuing two fleets at once, he had missed of them both; and if secondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere, hee thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not haue leisure to doe much mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Naue followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africke, and ouer-tooke him after sixe dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard; and wearied themselves, in seeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, & beat them; and, hauing funke, or taken many, draue the rest to flie which way they could, laden with such strange tidings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africke, then did hee discouer vnto them his proiect, letting them vnderstand, That there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians, not onely from Syracuse, but fro all the Ile of Sicily, than by bringing the war to their owne doores. For here (said he) they haue many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceiue that there is an Armie on foote, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntrained, and and vnexperienced in dangers, the mercenary forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can giue: which wemay better promise and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to let fire on all their ships (referring one or two to vie as Messengers,) to the end that no hope should remaine, saue onely in victory. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities, which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of ostentation to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed, thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicil. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had escaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage vnto the enemy; they raise a great Armie, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno, and Bomilcar, great enemies, and therefore the more vnlkely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldom happens, that dissension betwene Commanders produceth any so fortunate event. Necessity draue Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not stirre: but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who putting his victorie winneth many Townes, and lends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicil, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to bee lost, whilst hee was trauieling in the conquest of Sicil. Amilcar sends them fether thousand men: all his forces hee thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles backe into Sicil, than to be drawne home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a badde issue. Hee spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracusians: and hauing brought his matters to some good order, hee conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surpris. It was a prettie (though tragically) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that he should suppe the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and he verily beleued it. He made more haste than good speed, toward the Citie: and comming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrappe him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that hee had no great charge to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. Hee had allured Opbellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliuer the Countie into his hands: for that (as he said) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to haue diuerted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might reigne quietly. Opbellas came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murder this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his Warres. Thus his villanie found good successe; and he so prevailed in Africke, that hee gotley sure to make a step into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had embraced a desire of recovering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had so long bene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countie. These had prevailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of

And hee returned into Africk, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his sonne, had lost a battaile; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to helpe himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lacke of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoyle. It had now bene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) haue giuen to him, both money enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had bene distressed, not onely by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame hee was awaked, by the losse of a battaile, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange euents following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the fildoll, in way of thankfulness for their victorie. The fire, with which these vnhappy men were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings neereft vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult as is vsuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt vpon the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fledde away; each of them beleuing, that the noise in the aduerser Campe, was a signe of the enemies comming to make it. But the Carthaginians had a safe retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) hee beganne to assault them, and was so stoutly resisted, that hee lost in this blinde fight, about foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neere hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne fastitie, he knew no more how to moderate his present weake feares, than lately he had known how to gouerne his ambition. Therefore hee tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to steale closely a-boord his ships, with his younger sonne (the elder hee suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to sit into Sicil; thinking it the best course to hit for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Armie. His elder son, Archagathus, perceived his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by meanes of a sudden tumult, he was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noysed through the Armie, all was in vpror; and extremie of rage caused not onely the common Souldier, but euen such as had bene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base; I need not vie words to proue: That his feare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the sequels doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuertheless a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nintene talents. Likewise, Agathocles himselfe, hauing lost his Armie, did neuertheless, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace with Carthage vpon equal termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraigne enemies, discouered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, vied him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoyles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee deuised new engines of torment; wherein straining to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, hee made a frame of brasse, that should serue to scorch mens bodies, and withall giue him leaue to behold them in their miserie. So deuillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slaue to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that he neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when hee was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preferre his estate: he threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Countie, took armes against him, and draue him into such feare, that hee was faine to secke the loue at Carthage, which by ruling well hee might haue had in Sicil. Hee freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phenicians in Sicily, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They required him honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed against the Rebels, and sealed his estate. Having no further businesse left in Sicily, he made a voyage into Italy. There he subdued the Bruttians, rather by terror of his name, than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when hee had gotten this great summe, hee would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoyle the Temples of their gods. Herein (me-thinks) hee did well enough. For how could hee beleue those to be gods, that had continually giuen deafe eares to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous sicknesse fell vpon him, that rotted his whole body, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, came only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Aegypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Agathocles, before mentioned, and a younger sonne of his owne, began to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the contouersie by the olde Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well that he slue his Vncle, and got his Grand-fathers Kingdome, without asking any leaue. These tidings wounded the heart of Agathocles with feare and sorrow. Hee saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngriuous Nephew, from whom he knew that no fauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom only hee now held deare, which were Theogenia and her children. Therefore he aduised her and them to flie before they were surprisid: for that otherwise they could by no means auoide, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and made speed into Aegypt. After their departure, whether hee threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as hee first beganne it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traitorously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Iland. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicily. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driuen to fend for Pyrrhus to help them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countrey (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophcing that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiouritie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our storie will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuatiō of the Roman warre in Sicily. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, seeks to settle the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

When Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to bee offended with him, for helping himselfe by what means hee could, when they were not in case to giue him assistance; and forcing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilst Rome and Carthage were fighting for the mastery. In this good mood, the new Roman Consul, M. Valerius, and C. Octavius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made use of their present aduantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Armie into Sicily; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syracusians held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the whole time of their abode in the Iland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no less to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdom to runne into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straying themselves to giue him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare a very strong siege. And heereupon it is like that they were the more slacke, in lending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne work might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged City was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had beene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to try the vtmost hazard of war against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be gouerned by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, so long as he might preferue his owne tyrannie: the later, as a iust and good Prince, had no greater desire than to winne the love of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that he enioyed a long and happy regne, liuing deare to his own Subjects, beloved of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, that they had left him to himselfe, or he left their societie, made vnrilling to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compasse it.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Seafight in generall.

Hieron, having sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victuals, and other necessities: so that they, presuming vpon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troopes they had in Spain, to come to their aide; who being arrived, they made the City of Agigentum, the seat of the war, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, hauing made peace with Hieron, returne into Italy; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus, and Quintus Mamilius, arrive. They goe on towards Agigentum: and finding no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were fortified with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harvest being come, a part of the Roman Armie range the Countrey to gather corne, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sallie furiously, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the towne with great losse; but by the limar sele on both sides, the Affilians redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their couert. Yet the Carthaginians meane miles about the walls; and it had sometimes in it eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This City, by reason of the fertility of the soile, and the neighbour-hood of Carthage, grow in a short space from small beginnings, to great glory and riches. The pleasure and laurie thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, That the Agigentines built Palaces of such superfluous as they might haue for ever; and made such feasts as if they meant to die the next day. But their greatest pompe and magnificence, was in their yearly temples, and diuines, water-conduits, and fountains: the ruins whereof at this day are sufficient arguments, that Rome did neuer boast of the like. In the Porch of the temple of Iupiter Olympus, (by which way we may iudge of the temple it selfe) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished marble of diuers colours, it would be most magnificient and rare, that euer hath bene seene. On the other side the warre of Troy, and the encounters which happened at the taking of the city in ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter workes of that kinde, are but peece things, and meere trifles. It would require a volume to expresse the magnificence of the temples of Hercules, Asclepiades, Concord, Iuno Lucina, Chastitie, Prudence, Coffeand, Pallas, wherein the Masterpieces of those exquisite painters, and Carvers, Phidias, Xenocles, Myron, and Polygnetus, were to be seene. But in proesse of time it ranne the same fortune that all other great Cities haue done, and was razed by diuers causes of warre: whereof this warre present brought vnto it not the least.

Romans

Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deepe trench, betwene the walls of the Citie and their Campe : and another on the out-side thereof ; that neither the Carthaginians might force any suddenly, by a fallie, nor those of the Countrie without break vpon them vnwares : which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiving any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whilst the Siracusian supplies the assaillants with what they want. The besieged fend for succour to Carthage : after they had bene in this fort pent vp five months. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno ; who arriues with it at Heraclea, to the West of Aggrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbelus, a Citie wherin the Romans had bestowed all their provision. By means hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Aggrigentum ; and the Roman campe no lesse streightly assieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans : inso-much, as if Herens had not supplied them, they had bene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise ; Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclea, hee makes approach vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolute to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directeth the Numidian horsemen to charge the Vanguard, to the end to draw them further on ; which done, hee commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behinde some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly ; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and having slaughtered many, beates the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two months, but lay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some opportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Aggrigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremities which he endured, was able to brooke such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consuls to fight : But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day : and with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopelesse of succor, resolute to make his owne way. Finding therefore, that the Romans, after this daies victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night ; hee rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine : sure they were, that hee could not carry the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entered, and pittifully spoyled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposed rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this Warre, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts : but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily ; and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good successe, to saile out into Africa. It is the discase of Kings, of States, and also of priuate men, to couet the greatest things, but not to enioy the least ; the desire of that which weneither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what wee haue already. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World vnto this day.

To prosecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus O'Facilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land Townes gaue themselves vnto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often invaded by the African fleets, as also to equal themselves in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And heerein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by five on euery banke, and twenty, of three on a banke : and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-larks many many leares, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whercon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the land with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed euery yeere) was made Admirall : who being more in loue with this new kinde of warfare, then well aduised, past ouer to Messina with fouenteene Gallies, leauing the rest to follow him. There hee staid not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of seruice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian was at the sametime Governour in Panormus ; who being aduised of this new Sea mans arriuall, sent forth one Boodes, a Senator of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Consull vnwares,ooke both him and the fleet hee commanded. When Hannibal receiued this good news, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consull ; hee grew no lesse foolishly hardie then Cornelius had bene. For hee, fancying to himselfe to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points provided ; sought them out with a fleet of fittie saile : wherewith falling among them, hee was well beaten, and leauing the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest : for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans vnder Cornelius had lost but fouenteene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fittie.

The Romans, being aduised of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make hast to redeeme him, but giue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duisius. Duisius, considering that the Roman vessels were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speed of them, deuised a certaine Engine in the prow of his Gallies, wherby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as wee call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the waighier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse thrust them, nor their Mariners craft ; the Vessels wherewith both Nations fought, being open : so that all was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heauier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush and cracke the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steadie ; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may be giuen betwene one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a London barge.

Certainely, hee that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must bee skilfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in : he must beleue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during ; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betwene fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre : for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Strofie, lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, benee lost in the yeere 1588. if hee had not benee better aduised, than a great many malignant foles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboard them ; and hee had none : they had more ships then hee had, and of higher building and charging ; so that, had hee intangled himselfe with those great and powerful Vessels, hee had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter ; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it : which had hee not done, hee had not benee worthy to haue held his head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for priuate hands then for the Presse) I say, That a fleet of twentie shippes, all good sailers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselves neere together, in a grosse Squadron ; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall backe vpon their owne next fellows : of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruiceable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which give themselves scope, after they have giuen one broad side of Artillicrie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may give them the other: and so the twentie ships batter them in pieces with a perpendicull vollic; whereas those, that fight in a troope, haue no room to turne, and can alwayes vse but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred saile give themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet preuaile, either against those that are a-reare & hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of our-failing their fellows keepe the winde: and if vpon a Lee-shore, the ships next the winde bee constrained to fall backe into their owne squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole fleet must suffer shipwacke, or render it selfe. That such advantage may be taken vpon a fleet of vnequall speed, it hath bin well enough conceiued in olde time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, to which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be obserued.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I haue written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a subiect, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne but God hath spared mee the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that brave Prince, of which, like an Eclipse of the Sunne, we shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall words and forrowes; I will therefore leaue him in the hands of God that hath him. Cursus loquuntur, ingentes spent.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians, who by losing their advantage of swift boats, & boarding the Romans, haue lost the sickele of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertie to saile about the West part of Sicily, where they raised the siegelayed vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

§. VII.

Diners enterprizes of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable success. The Romans prepare to invade Africk: and obtaine a great victory at Sea.

THe victorie of Dulius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Nauell triumph, that was euer scene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great encouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not onely to get Sicily, but all the other Iles betwene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whether soone after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being aduertised, that some quarrell was growne betwene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to in campe a part, he sent forth Hanno to set vpon them, who taking them vnawares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicily, Hannibal, who had lately beene beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprize. Now it to fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Seas from Sicily, arrived in the port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set vpon him vnawares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himselfe hardly escaping the danger. But it little equalled him to haue escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second vnfourte voyage, that they hanged him vp for his dilIGENCE: for (as it hath beene laid of old) Non est hic in bello perire, in warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere anything of importance was done by the Consuls, till Panormus was besieged: where, when the Romans had fought in vaine to draw the Carthaginians to the field; being vnable to force that great Citie, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they then departed from thence, and tooke certaine In-land Townes, as Mytilastrum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, betwene Panormus and Messana.

The year following, C. Attilius the Consul, who commanded the Roman fleet, discovered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: and, not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But hee was well beaten for the haste hee made, and lost all, save the Gallie which transported him: wherein himselfe escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Attilius his fleet was gotten vp: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs: by which the victory remaining doubtfull, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies, the Carthaginians of three hundred and fiftie, Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

The Romans resolve to transport the warre into Africk, the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicily. The numbers, with which each of them filled their fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that euer fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage an hundred and fifty thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred rowers to every Gallie, one with the other. The Roman fleet was diuided into foure parts, of which the three first made the forme of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flanks, and the third Squadron, the Base: the point thereof (wherein were the two Consuls as Admiralls) looking toward the enemy, and the middle space lying empty. Their Vessells of carriage were towed by the third Squadron. After all came vp the fourth, in forme of a Crescent; very well manned, but exceeding thinn: so that the hornes of it inclosed all the third Squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conceiue by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I coniecture, that the front of their fleet was thinn, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en hay; a long front of horse, and thinn: which forme, since the Pistoll preuailed ouer the Lance, they haue changed. Behind this first outstretched front, their Battalions were more solide: for Amilcar, Admirall of the Carthaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies hauing the speed of the Romans) that, when the first fleet of the Romans halted to breake through the first Gallies, they should all tume taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victory) disorder themselves, and, for cagernesie of taking the Run-awaies, leaue their owne three squadrons fare behind them. For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the third Squadron towed their horse-boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcars direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinn front of the Carthaginian first fleet, which ranne away, they forthwith gaue after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behinde them for the second Squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne nere vnto the body of the Carthaginian fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the first) receiued a great losse, vntill their second Squadron came vp, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, invaded the Romane Rearward, and preuailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Attilius fell backeto their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to sustain both squadrons. The Rearre being relieved, the Consuls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed the victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Carthaginians: but the Consuls, joining their squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running.

This victorie fell vnto the Romans, partly by the hardinesse of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could neuer after ioyne himselfe vnto any of his other squadrons, that remained as yet in a faire likelihood of preuailling, so long as they fought vpon equal termes, and but Squadron to Squadron. But Amilcar forsaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Romane fleet vnengaged, and readie to giue succour to any of the other parts that were opprest. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they lost but foure and twentie of theirs; whereas the Africans lost thirtie that were sunke, and threecore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also diuided his fleet into foure squadrons, (besides those that hee ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, whilst hee himselfe fought with one squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had bene at the same time entertained, hee had prevailed: But the second squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppressed: and Amilcar, being oppressed and scattered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieue both the third and the fourth squadron, and got the victorie.

Charles the first, among other his Precepts to Philip the second his sonne, where hee aduise him concerning Warre against the Turkes, tells him, that in all batailles betweene them and the Christians, he should neuer faile to charge the Tamfars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Tamfars, who are alwaies reserved intire in the Rere of the bataille, and in whom the Turke repositeth his greatest confidence, come vp in a grosse body, when all the troops, on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the victorie before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romans also preuaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triarij in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and victorious advantage it hath ever been found, to keepe some one or two good troopes to looke on, when all else are disbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans preuaile in Africa. Atilius the Consul propoundeth intollerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made prisoner.

NOW the Romans according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arrived at the Promontorie of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and 30 some fortie leagues from Hercules in Sicily, where Amilcar himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne about fiftie English mile from it. There they disembarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yielded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side; without which all inuasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither: burbidge aduertised that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all forts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, that one of the Consuls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Consul is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twenty thousand African Captaines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fiftene thousand foot, and five hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places that were walled, and laid siege to others. But hee performed no great matter, before hee came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the Riuer of Bagrada, hee encountered with a Serpent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which hee slew, not without losse of many Souldiers, being druen to vse against it such engines of warre, as were properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Bozlar, together with Amilcar, who had brought ouer out of Sicily six thousand foote, and five hundred horse to succour his Countrey. The (be-like) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were careful to hold themselves free, from necessity of coming to blowes: yet had they a great desire, to save the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adis, they incampe neere vnto him, and strongly strongly (as they thinke) on the top of an hill: but thereby they loose the seruices, both of their Elephants, and of their horie-men. This disadvantage of theirs Regulus diuouers, and makes vse of it. He assailes them in their strength, which they defend a-while, but in fine the Romans preuaile, & force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceeded to Tunis a Citie within sixteen miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

By the losse of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Namidiens, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult vpon their misfortunes; invade, and spoile their Territory, and force those that inhabite abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his owne advantage, and assures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out: yet hee feared lest it might defend it selfe, vntill his time of Office, that was nere expired, should bee quite ranne out; whereby the new Consuls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But hee propounded vnto them to vniuersall and bafe conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so couragious and disdainfull, that they refused, either to defend their libertie, or dieto the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troope of Greekes, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xanthippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received were vnto Adis, gaue it our publicly, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate; Xanthippus is sent for; gives the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led, consisted of no more then twelve thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libanie, Liores, Goods, Wiues, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by 30 sea, before spoken of, were misse-numbered; the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thousand: were it not commonlie found that they which vse the seruice of mercinarie Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xanthippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troops vpon sure and leuell ground, fittest both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it should soone bee abated. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorne hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drue backe the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least brake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their batailles deeper in file, than they had bene accustomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the lesse subiect vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they so much the more exposed vnto the violence of horse, wherein the Enemie did farre exceed them. The Elephants were placed by Xanthippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horsemen, and some light-armed foot, of the Carthaginian Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onse was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the squadrons neuertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, hauing at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, druen those of Atilius out of the fildes, beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great distresse; who being forced to turne face every way, could neither passe forward nor yet retire; but had very much ado to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backes, fell vpon the Carthaginian Armie, that met them in very good array. It was no cūm match. The one were a disordered Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to haue dealt with the enemie vpon equall termes. Here was therefore a greater slaughter with little fight; the Romanes hastily recoyling to the bodie of their Armie, which being surrounded with the enemie, and spent with traualle, fell all to rout, vpon the defeat of these troupes, that open the way to a generall overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victorie; destroying the whole Roman Armie, saue two thousand, and taking five hundred prisoners, together with Attius the Confull. Of their owne they lost no more then eight hundred mercenaries, which were slaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romanes: that wheeling about to auoid the Elephants, bare downe all before them, and made way cūen to the Carthaginians to trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romanes know, that they were no lesse her vassals, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent ſouer they had beene in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their proprietie, which she neuer gaue nor sold to any mortall man. With what ioy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no lesse then this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of Eurypides, Mens vna sapiens, plurium viciis manus; Many mens hands equal not one wise minde.

After this great seruice done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that hee was more enuid then honoured, or for what other cause, it is vknowne.

The death of Attius Regulus the Confull, was very memorable. Hee was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ranſome of prisoners on both ſides: ſignifying his faith to returne if the buſineſſe were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainde ſaw that his Countie ſhould loſe by the bargain: ſo ſaue was he from vrging the Senate vnto compaſſion of his owne miſerie, that hee earnestly perſwaded to haue the prisoners in Africke left to their ill deſtinies. This done, hee returned to Carthage: where for his paines taken, hee waſteward d with an horrible death. For this his conſtancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians ſeemed to haue iudged him an obſtinate and malicious enemie; that neither in his proſperitie would hearken to reaſon, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to preſerue himſelfe and others, by yielding to ſuch an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) onely in regard of ſome ſmall advantage. Whatſoeuer the Carthaginians thought of him; ſure it is, that his faithfull obſeruance of his word giuen, cannot be too much commended. But that graue ſpeech, which he made in the Senate, againſt the exchange of prisoners, appeares, in all reaſon, to haue proceeded from a vaine-glorious forwardneſſe, rather than from any neceſſitie of State. For the exchange was made ſoone after his death; wherein the Romanes had the worſe bargain, by loſe⁴⁰ much as Regulus himſelfe was worth. As for the authoritie of all Hiſtorians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to conſider that they liued vnder the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did cenſure it otherwiſe. Yet the death which he ſuffered with extreme torments, could not be more grieuous to him than it was diſhonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuſe themſelves herein, otherwiſe than by recrimination: ſaying, That the Romanes deſerued to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary praſtice to vie others in the like ſort. Crueltie doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being cuſtomarie. It was the Roman faſhion, to whip almoſt to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke; yea although they were ſuch as had alſo waies made faire warres with them. Wherefore it ſeemes not meet, in reaſon, that they ſhould crie out againſt the like tyrannicall inſolencie in others, as if it were lawfull onely in themſelves.

The conſideration both of this miſfortune, that rewarded the pride of Attius his intolerable demands; and of the ſudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by mere deſperation; calls to remembrance, the like inſolencie of others in proſperitie, that hath bred the like reſolution in thoſe, to whom all reaſonable grace hath bene bee denied. In ſuch caſes I neuer hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more teſtimonies approving the true rules, from which our paſſions carry vs away.

In the yeere 1378. the Genowais wonne ſo faſt vpon the Venicians, as they not onely drave their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice itſelfe. This bred ſuch an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genowais (their State referred) whatſoeuer they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would hearken to no compoſition; ſaue the yielding of their Citie and State to his diſcretion. Hereupon, the Venicians, being filled with diſdaine, thruſt out to Sea with all their remaining power, and aſſaile Doria with ſo rich deſperate furie, that they brake his fleet, kill Doria himſelfe, take nineteene of his Gallies, foureſcore boats of Padoa, and foure thouſand priſoners; recouer Chiozza, and all the places taken from them; and following their victorie, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genowais, baſely to begge peace, to their extreme diſhonour and diſadvantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might haue commanded, to their greateſt honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the yeere 1380. when hauing taken a notable, and which all an ouer-cruell reuenge vpon the Gantois, hee reſuſed mercy to the reſt, who in all humilitie, ſubmitting themſelves to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and eſtates, to be diſpoſed at his pleaſure. This when hee had vniuſuſedly reſuſed, and was reſolved to extinguiſh them utterly; they iſſue out of their Citie with five thouſand choſen men, and armed with a deſperate reſolution, they charge the Earle, brake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquiſhed followers, and enforce him to hide himſelfe vnder an heape of ſtraw, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie hee eſcaped, and ſaued himſelfe. Such are the fruits of inſolencie.

How the affairs of Carthage prospered after the victorie againſt Attius: How the Romans hauing loſt their fleet by tempeſt, reſolue to ſorke the Seas: The great advantages of a good fleet in warre, betwene Nations diuided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victorie, all places that had beene loſt in Africke, returned to the obedience of Carthage. Onely Clypea ſtands out; before which the Carthaginians ſit downe, and aſſaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, hearing of the loſſe of Attius with their forces in Africke, and withall, that Clypea was beſieged, make ready a groſſe Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and ſixtie Gallies, commanded by M. Aemilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Conſuls. At the Prorogatory of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, ſet out for purpoſe, vpon the bruite of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their coſt. For the Romans tooke by force an hundred and foureteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they ſtaid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had beene beſieged: and this done, they made amaine toward Sicily, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this haſty voydge they deſpise the aduice of the Pilots, who pray them to ſinde harbour in time, for that the ſeaſon threatned ſome violent ſtormes, which enuſhaped betwene the riſing of Orion, and of the * Dog-Starre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleete had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certiſied them withall, that the South coaſt of Sicily had no good Ports, wherein to ſaue themſelves vpon ſuch an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perſwaded, that the winde and ſeaſe feared them no leſſe, than did the Aſſians; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themſelves. So reſuſing to ſtay within ſome Port, as they were aduſed, they would needes put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victorie againſt the Carthaginian fleet, to take a few wortheleſſe Townes vpon the coaſt. The merceleſſe winde in the meane while ouertake them, and nere vnto Camerins, ouerturne and thruſt headlong on the rocks, all but foureſcore of three hundred and forty ships: so as their former great victory was denoured by the Seas, before the same thereby recovered Rome.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Vessels, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-forces since the ouerthrow of Attilus. They send Afrubal into Sicily with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortie Elephants, imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arriues at Lilybæum; where he begins to vex the Partisans of Rome. But industrie doth not discourage the Romanes: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twenty ships; with which, and the remainder of their last shipwracke, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicily, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison there, in, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to be doing in Africk: to which purpose they imployed C. Scruilius, and C. Sempronius, their Consuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoile they made vpon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to haue perished, nerec vnto the lesser Syres, where they were faine to heaue all ouer-board, that they might get off: then, hauing with much a doe doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fittie of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the god of the warres fauoured them no more, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Marcus enriched them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, foure hundred and fixe Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby receiued, perswaded them to giue out their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send onely a Land-armie into Sicily, vnder L. Cassius, and P. Furius, their Cor suls. These they transported in some three score ordinary pottage-boats, by the streights of Messana, that are not aboue a mile and a halfe broad from land to land. In like fort, the ouerthrow which Attilus receiued in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two yeeres after, they kept the high and wooddie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champion Countreys. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicily, without a Nauie, much lesse to maintain the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egeita, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicily, making sometimes a march of aboue an hundred and forty Englisb mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the propositions that follow it, in lesse than foure score daies, the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and fortie houres.

An old example we haue, of that great aduantage of transporting Armies by water, betweene Canutus and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Nauie and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued, and sailing to the West, landed in Dorsetshire, so drawing Edmond and his Army thither. There finding ill entertainment, he againe shipt his men, and entred the Suuerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcestershire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed backe againe to London: by meanes whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arriue. And this was not the least helpe, which the Netherlands haue had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwearied, and entrie, with all the Munition and Artillerie belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies haue beene able to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now liuing, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceeding Ages haue brought forth; in the yeare 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with fortie Canons, to Brada: making countenance either to besiege Brissledac, or Gertreniden Berg; which the enemy (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and victuals. But as soone as the wind serued, he suddenly set saile, arriuing in the mouth of the Menze, turned vp the Rhine, and thence to Tissel, and sat downe before Zunphen. So before the Spaniards could could march ouer-land round about Holland, aboue fourescore mile, and ouer many great Riuers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zunphen was taken. Againe, when the Spanish Armie had ouercome this wearisome march, and were now farre from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to saile vp the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and following downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Towne he also tooke, before the Spanish armie could returne. Lastly, the Spanish armie was to sooner arriue in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, hauing fortified Hulst, set saile againe, and presented himselfe before Nymegen in Gelder, a Citie of notable importance, and mastered it.

And to say the truth, it is impossible for any maritime Countreie, not hauing the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerfull enemy, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolved to hinder Sir Iohn Norris in the yeare 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would haue kept off the Englisb, by power of his land-forces; as being too weak: at Sea, through the great ouerthrow of his mighty Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeere foregoing. Surely, it had not bene hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to resist our eleuen thousand. But where should this Armie haue beene bestowed? If about Lysborne; then would it haue bene easie vnto the Englisb, to take, ransacke, and burne the Towne of Graine, and to waste the Countreie round about it. For the great and threatening preparations of the Earle of Alcama, the Marquesse of Serriba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hastie leaue of eight thousand, vnder the Earle of Andrada, serue to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir Iohn Norris and his Associates: considering, that the Englisb charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them, tooke their campe; tooke their Generals standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them ouer all the Countreie, which they fired. If a royal Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of priuate aduenturers, had thus begun the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would haue made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haste to the defence of their S. Iago, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir Iohn Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armie, into his Kingdome, whither coming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed: could they haue hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Peniche, and march ouer the Countreie to Lysborne, sixe dayes iourney? Did not hee (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the River of Lysborne to Cascalis, and there, hauing won the Fort, quickly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englisbmen. Let vs consider of the matter it selfe; what another Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, whether an inuading Armie may be resisted at their landing vpon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeache it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obseruations vpon Cæsars Commentaries, that maintains the affirmatiue. This he holds onely vpon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatively, as that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keep our enemy from treading vpon our ground: wherein, if we faile, then must we seek to make him wish, that he had staid at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question general, and positiue, Whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemy from landing; I hold that it is vnable so to doe: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduerture. For the incouragement of a first victory to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the inuaded, may draw after it a most perillous consequence.

I thinke, that the Marshall Momius, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to haue kept the frontier of Guienne, they of the Protestant

Protestant religion, after the battaile of Moncouster, entred that Countrey, and gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King (saith he) would haue giuen me but reasonable means, Jeusiebiu garde a Monsieur l'Admiral, de faire boire Jes Cheuaux en la Garonne, I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Langey, on the contrary side, preferres the not fighting vpon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when he inuaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is; and a diuers consideration to be had, betwene such a Countrey as France is, strengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inuasions vpon firme land, that these great Captaines spake: whose entrances cannot be vncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Countrey, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be redisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrey: except euery Creeke, Port, or sandy Bay, had a powerfull Armie, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be grained, That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot, and that those twelve thousand be layed in the three best landing places within that Countrey, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and six thousand at Foulkston, that is some what equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troupes (vnlesse some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this prouision, if the enemy, setting saile from the Ile of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Armie on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twenty and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulkston be able to doe it, who are neerer by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enemy, at his first anall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thousand, that they were intrenched at the Nesse, to 30 runne; or else giue them so much to doe, that they shall be glad to fend for helpe to Foulkston, and perhaps to Margat: whereby those places will be left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be ready to disembark his Armie, so that he shall finde it vnwise, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we beleue, that he will play the best of his owne game; and (hauing liberty to goe which way he list) vndercovert of the night, set saile towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to doe it. Yea the like may be said of Waymouth, Parbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there 40 is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily outrun the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne violent point en poste; Armees neither flye, nor run post, saith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of Ships may be seen at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lizard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not be able to march it in fixe dayes. Again, when those troupes, lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to run from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships, they will at length sit downe in the mid-way, and leaue all at adventure. But say it were otherwise, That the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilbarie in the yeere 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should haue landed in England.

The Ile of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art: it being euery where hard of access, hauing no good harbour whereto shelter a Naue of of friends; and vpon euery coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monsieur de Chatter, that held it to the vie of San Antonio, with five or sixe thousand men, thought to haue kept the Marquesse of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquesse hauing shewed himselfe in the Roade of Angra, did set saile, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, farre distant from thence, where he was a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chatter, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Strusse, saue the yeere before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chatter and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be perswaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and backe againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; wherof the French-men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselves preuented by threemore nimble ships of Spain.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list in England, France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindered, encountered, and shuffed together, by a fleet of equal, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fajal, in the yeere 1597. is alleged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I indeede thinke English in Fajal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may by a ciuill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that voyage, who advised me not to vndertake it: and I harkened vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they desired me, to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gave them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintain, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, then to inuade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more easie then I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place, yea euen there where I landed, if I would haue taken more company to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Spaniards should not thinke any advantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Country Captaines, and others, not of mine owne Squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (though it would haue been short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driuen to turne backe. Therefore Iooke with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne Squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harney, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Stan, Sir Thomas Ridgway, Sir Henrie Thimne, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Broockmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselves and the enemy: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vnderooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the Cliffs, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or sixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketers lay on the rest for vs, and won the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done with lesse danger, so that it should not haue serued for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example: but the reasons before alleged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more priuate, then to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauery, and take the shorter course, hauinge still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more then a Coward; (which yet was more then we knew) neither will it magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom had I thought thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concerns the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he fought how to stop vs in place of his advantage; that many of our men were slain or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when we had won good footing) would needs follow vs to the Towne, were driuen by him, to forsake the pace of a man of war, and besetke themselves to an hasty trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall, his Maiesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdain, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten vpon their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne becke in their bellies, and before they care of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Maiesty, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment vpon the shore.

§. X.

How the Romans attempt againe to get the mastery of the Seas. The victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consul at Panormus: The siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gallie entered Lilybæum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grievous losses received, vnder Claudius and Iunius their Consuls, abandon the Seas againe.

When, without a strong Naue, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resolved once againe, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of warre. So causing fiftie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Asilius, and L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwracke which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they received by Antippos in Africa, were lesse daring than they had beene in the beginning of the warre: and withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cæcilius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Panormus; he remoued with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consull was better aduised. For when Asdrubal had made his approches somewhat neerer the Towne, Cæcilius called a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattle a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gaue order that they should aduance themselves, and passe over the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brink of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench itselfe, that being intraged by their many wounds, they brake backe furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vterly disordered them. Cæcilius, espying this advantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he vtterly brake them, and put them to their heeles; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome, the whole State, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicily, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted fouretee yeeres. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolved to attempt Lilybæum, the onely place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicily, and all (indeede) laue Drepanum, that was neere adioyning. They set down before it, and possessed themselves of all the places of advantage neere vnto it, especially of such as command the haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground, sixe towres of defence, and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, as the defendants begin to despair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the Place, saileth not all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giueth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers, among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is revealed by an Achæan, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saved Agrippionem. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers, and imployeth Himilco to appeale the troups of the Gauls, which did waue, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All this he doth with constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vnable to performe what they had vndertaken, are faine to lue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Himilco the sonne of Amilcar, for their Comandor: who, in despite of all resistance, entered the Port and Citie, to the incredulity of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto prouoked by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolute to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the extremest, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficulty defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vndertakes the seruice; and hauing received his dispatch, sailes with one Galliero Agusta, a little Island neere Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the darke night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who wated his returne, he set saile, and shipped his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quicke of sterage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recovered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being incompassed by the party, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauens, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to vndertake him. This enterprize, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondered at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a farre-off, the aduantage which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and iudicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde: no though some peeces of great Artillerie open their mouths against him, and threaten to teare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Quenes time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at War, our East Land fleet, bound for Leifland, as forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subjects of his enemies, & he threatened to sinke their ships if they came through the straits of Elfsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maiesties, called the Atimion, to defend them) made the aduantage, and sustaining some Volleys of shot, kepe on their course. The King made all the prouision he could, to stop them, or sinke them, at their returne. But the Atimion commanded (as I take it) by William Burroughs, leading the way, did not onely passe out with little losse, but beat downe, with artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elfsenour; which at that time was not so well ramparted, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Ferna besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Canon on the bancke of the Riuier, so well to purpose and so cūen with the face of the water, that hee thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne vp by any winde of glorie, but comming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheefe, euen the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreame deare in Antwerp, passed in boats often or twelve Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of flood fauoured them; as also with a contrarie winde, and an ebbing winde, they turned backe againe: so as hee was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado ouerthwart the Riuer, to his maruailous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not vs in the yeere 1596. when we entred the Port of Caliz; neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaid vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blanche, from fixe in the morning till twelue at noone. The siege of Offend, and of many other places, to may be giuen for proofe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angrain Teretia, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the ships are driuen to come vpon a bow-line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great vse, and feare full: otherwise not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: He arriues in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybaeum. Others also, after this take vpon them to doe the like, and performe with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to choke the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sinke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe in part: but they grounded so many of those great bellied boates in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Island, in the passage. Hereby came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her courte by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the braue Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chase, and gathered vpon him; hee findes what she is, both by her forme and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, refused to fight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that hee is beaten and taken.

Lilybaeum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there is so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans wooden Towers, by which they ouer-top the wals of Lilybaeum, were ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier vnder takes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and wearinesse hinder the Romans: from repairing their Engines: so that they resolute, by a long siege, to starue the defendants.

Vpon relation of what had past, a supply of tenne thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, vnder M. Claudius, the Consull. Hee arriues at Messana, and marcheth ouer land to Lilybaeum: where hauing re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the purpose of Drepanum, a Citie on the other side of the Bay of Lilybaeum. This seruice the Capitaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull imbarques his troups, and arriues on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Gouernour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arriued at Lilybaeum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but hauing recovered his spirits, he perswades the Souldiers, rather to fight broad, than to be inclosed. Herewithall he promisseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deliuer them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Hauing sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consull, decciued of his expectation, calls backe the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his aduantage, and forceth the Consull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, hauing the land on his backe: hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being inclosed. But hee was thereby, and for want of Sea-roume, so straitened, as hee could not turne himselfe any way from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when hee found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, hee thrust out of the Bay with thirty thirte Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away: all the rest of his fleet, to the number of nineteene and foure ships, were taken or sunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this seruice is greatly honoured at Carthage, and Claudius, for his indiscretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threecore Gallies, with which they send away L. Iunius, their Consull, to take charge of their businesse in Sicill. Iunius arriues at Messana, where he meetes with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybaeum. One hundred and twentie Gallies hee had; and besides these, hee had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessary prouisions for the Armie. With this great fleet hee arriues at Syracuse, where he staies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for some, that were too slow of saile, to keepe company with him along from Messana. In the meane time, hee dispatcheth away towards Lilybaeum, his Quaestor, or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their comoy.

Adherbal was not carelesse, after his late victory: but studied how to vse it to the best aduantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies hee deliuered thirte to Carthalo, who had threecore and tenne more vnder his owne charge; and sent him to try, what good might be done against the Roman fleet, in the Haven of Lilybaeum. According to this direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where he findes the Romans, more attentive to the keeping in of the besieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne against another fleet. So hee chargeth them, boards and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and hasties to the rescue. But Himilco, Gouernour of the Towne, is not behinde hand; who kills out at the same time, and putting the Romans to great distresse, giues Carthalo good liuetie to goe through with his enterprize.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coast of Sicill, deuiling how to worke mischief to the enemy; wherein Fortune presented him with a faire occasion, which hee wisely managed. He was aduertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, neere at hand, a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessels. These were the victuallers, which the Consull Iunius, more hastily than providently, had sent before him towards Lilybaeum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their comming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accompanying therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make strong opposition, hee hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to seeke shelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder covert of a poore Towne, belonging to their partie; that could helpe to saue them only from the present danger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that assailed them. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride vnder those rocks, but would be forced by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to faile their men, how they could, by taking land, with the losse of all their shipping. Whilest hee was buied in this care, the Consull Iunius drew neere, and was discovered. Against him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of what which had hapned. The Consull had neither means to flee, nor abilitie to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger so great, as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian, seeing this, betakes himselfe to a Station betwene the two Roman fleets, where hee watcheth, to see which of them would first stir, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put it selfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicill, betwene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybaeum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde stormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signes, finding (belike) some swelling billow (for so we doe in the West of England, before a Southerly storme) hastened to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauigate, and neuer found any soule weather in the entrails of their beasts, their Soothsayers being all land-prophets, were suddenly ouer-taken with a boisterous South winde, and all their Gallies forced against the rocks, and vtterly wracked.

This calamity so discouraged the Romans, that they resolved againe to forsake the Seas, and trust onely to the seruice of their Legions vpon firme ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make waite in an Land, against those that haue a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldom, or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian discoveries. Yet persisting in their enterprises, with an invincible constancie, they haue annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Provinces, as burie the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, overthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases, both old and new, together with extreme povertrie, and want of all things needefull, haue beene the enemies, wherewith euery one of their most noble Discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountered. Many yeeres haue passed ouer some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more then one or two, haue spent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift vndertakers, haue not bene disheartened. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasures, and Paradises, which they enioy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who stoutly holds warre with them five yeeres. The Romans hauing emptied their common treasure, build a new fleet, at the charges of priuate men. The great victorie at Sea of Lucianus the Consul; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crane peace. The conditions of the peace betwene Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were carefull, to supply with all industry, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybaeum, and seek to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemy ships could not bring reliefe. The Consul Iunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which he had received, betought him what enterprises to vndertake. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Island; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betwene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should retrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, furnished Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italie, did thoroughly repay the spoyle which the Romans made in Africa. For hee first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred hee into Sicily; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that serued fitly to infect the Romans, he occupied a peece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betwene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized vpon, was not onely very strong by situation, but he had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to scoute all the coast of Italie with his fleet, waiting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicily he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeeres abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could neuer be drawne to hazard the maine chance. Having wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, hee vndertooke a strange peece of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons placed there by Iunius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuerthelesse Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx; that was about the middle of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were straightly held (as it were) besieged. And no lesse was Amilcar himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeeres more, hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the prosecuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hannibal in Lute, Lib. Dec. 3. 11) spoke vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, since the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly vpon confidence of their land-forces, which they held resistlesse; Amilcar, with a small Armie, had so well acquired himselfe, to the honour of his Countrey, that by the triall of five yeeres warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was iudge'd equall, if not superiour to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had bene deuiled and gone, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the meltrie of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lacke of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treasure was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprife. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon priuate purses. Diuers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilities would not serue to doe the like, ioyned with some others, and laying their monie together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaid, when the war was finished. By this voluntary contribution, they made and furnished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybaeum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lucilius Catulus, who past with the same into Sicily, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, inducuring by all meanes to haue forced the Citie. But being advertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindefull of the late losses which his Predecessours had received; he was carefull to put himselfe in order, against their arrival.

Hann was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skillfull in the art of seeming reuerend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, or things vndertaken by men more worthy than himselfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is auerle from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great fore-sight, confirmed by euery losse received. More particularly, he was gracious among the people for that he was one of the most grievous oppressors of their libertie Provinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned all to their great losse. He had ere this bene employed against the Numidians; and wilde Africans, that were more like to Routers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitive Nations, he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsaile, when, hauing shewed himselfe an unworthy Capitaine, hee betooke himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is hee much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preferre the League betwene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deserved of his owne Countrey, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hann had very well furnished his Naue, with all needefull prouisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he had neither bene carefull in traying his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellows. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans glue way: forgetting, that rather the restlesse force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceiued aright, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to saile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading: and hauing thus lightened himselfe, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilcar himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make his enemy repent of his new aduventure to Sea. This was a good course, if it could haue bene performed, But Catulus vsed all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this designe: not because he was informed of the enemies purpose, but that he knew it to be the best for them, & for that he feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was descried; yet he rather chose to fight with the enemy, that had the winde of him, than to suffer this conuoy to passe along to Eryx, vpon unlikely hope of better opportunitie in the future. All that Hanno should haue done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; he had lightened his Gallies of all vnneccessarie burthens; and he had taken aboard the choicest men of the Roman Land-souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter, were vtterly broken and defeated, hauing fittie of their Gallies stemmed and sunke, and seauentie taken, wherein were few lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hieroneſus.

The state of Carthage, vtterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolve. Meines to repaire their fleet in any time there were none left; their best men of warre by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, vpon whose valour and iudgement the honour and safetie of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sicily, where hee could not be relieved. In this extremitie, they make dispatch vnto Amilcar himselfe, and authorize him to take what course should seeme best vnto his excellent wisdom; leauing all conclusions to his election and sole countaile.

Amilcar, whom no aduersitie, accompanied with the least hope or possibilitie of recovery, had euer vanquished, looking ouer euery promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (so to attend anything from the future hee was not able) resolved to make triall, whether his necessitie might be compounded vpon any reasonable termes. Hee therefore sent to Lutatius the Conſull an Ouerture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present poertie of the Roman State, waisted beyond expectation in the former warre, that hee willingly harkened vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with prouision, That it should hold none otherwife, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the Ile of Sicily. Secondly, that they should neuer vnder-take vpon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor inuade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at liberty and send backe into Italy, all the Romans, whom they hold prisoners, without ranſome. Lastly, that they should pay vnto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirtene hundred and twenty thousand crownes: the same to be deliuered within twenty yeeres next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not thoroughly approued: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicily, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former sum; and required a shorter time of payment. Further also, they took order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicily it selfe, but should also with-draw their Companies out of all the other Ilands betwene it and Italy, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punick Warre, that had lasted about twentie foure yeeres without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwracke, about seuen hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about five hundred: the greatnesse of which losses, doth serue to proue the greatnesse both of these two Cities, and of

of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the iudgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in general, did thew themselves the brauer Nation; and Amilcar, the most wortheie Capitaine.

CHAP. II.

Of diuers actions passing betwene the first and second Punick Warres.

§. I.

Of the cruell Warre begonne betwene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercenaries.

HE Romans, hauing partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and all the little Ilands thereunto adiacent, gaue them rather meanes and leasure to helpe themselves in a following Warre; then cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quod leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are giuen by the Conquerors, and receiued of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made vnto them, by one of the Prinernates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this waighy businesse. For when one of Prinernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his City, was demanded by a Senator, what peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present aduantage over them; he answered in these words, Si bonum desideris, et fidem et perpetuam; si malum, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithful that you giue vs, it will be perpetual; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answer, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was said, *Viri et liberi vocem audiamus, an credi posset, nullum populum, aut hominem denig in ea condicione, cuius tempestate, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who could beleue, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue long in an over-burdened estate, than mere necessity did enforce? Now if the Romans themselves could make this iudgement, of those Nations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to defend their libertie; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior vnto themselves, would sit downe any longer by the losse and dishonour receiued, than vntill they could recouer their legs, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publique States, haue more prevailed, than by any proper prouesse or vertue, with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearfully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.*

For after that the first Punick Warre was ended; Amilcar, leauing Eryx, went to Lilibanum, from whence most conueniently the Armie might be transported into Affrick: to the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gesco, to whom, as to a man of approved sufficiencie, he deliuered over his charge. Gesco had an especial consideration of the great summes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them out (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that so the first might haue their dispatch, and begone, ere the second or third Companies arrived. Heerein he dealt prouidently. For it had not bene hard to perswade an small number, lodged within so great a City as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present extremitie of the common Treasure did require: so that the first might haue bene friendly discharged; and a good president left vnto the second and third; whilst their disfunction had made them them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would bee contented to graetifie the Publique State, by remitting a great part of their owne due : and hoped by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers ; telling them, that they would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed ; which much disquieted the Citie, nor accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place where they might bee lesse troublesome. This must bee done by some colourable words of persuasion : for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicca : receiuing euery one a piece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dislodge ; leauing behinde them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came backe for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fancie to their returning into the Towne, and therefore compell them to trust vp their fardells, that they might haue none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods, and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawn to mutinie : the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their chiefe talke was, how rich they should be, when all their money came in ; how much would fall to euery single share ; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians ; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, euen beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten ; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away ; vntill the whole Armie being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich ; especially if they can hold together, in maintaininge thoutie the common cause. So thinke they all ; and assemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought : with a full resolution to help his memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them ; all which were to be considered in their Donatiue. Hanno begins a very formall Oration ; wherein he bewailes the poverty of Carthage ; tells them, how great a summe of money is to bee paid vnto the Romans ; reckons vp the excessiue charges, wherewith the common wealth had bene in the late warre ; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they beare vnto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourse : for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceived the whole tenor of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought ; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men, so that nothing would serue to appease them.

Hanno would faine haue asswaged their furie, but he knew not how : for hee lesse vnderstood their dissonant lowd noyses, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of so many countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easilie stirred vp to mutinie, nor easilie pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can do, is to vse the helpe of Interpreters and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning, some, for want of skill, others of seru purpose ; and such as deliuer his errands in the worst sense, are best beleued. Finally, they thinke themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolute to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a nearer distance. In this mood they leaue Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne errour. It is a good rule,

Carthagini

Curandum imprimis, ne magna iniuria fiat Fortibus & miseris.

Haue speciall care, that valiant pouertie
Be not opprest with too great iniurie.

But this proud citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath alio beene carelesse in providing to secure her selfe against the inconuenience that might follow. Shee had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto she was like to giue cause of discontent, to ioyne it selfe into one bodie, when the seuerall troupes might easily haue bene dispersed : she hath turned out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of these poore men, which had she retained in these of kindest, the might haue vsed them as Hostages, for her own safety ; and by employing a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of Warre, she hath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best haue serued to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no desire to bee vsed as an instrument in defrauding his owne Souldiers of their wages : especially considering, that as he best could beare witness of their merits, so was he not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had bene willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched counsaile, vpon the liberal promises made by the Captaines. Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to haue the managing of their owne plot, and to deale the cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to doe as foolishly, as they had at first begun. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the souldiours ; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send euer and anon some of their Senators into the Campe ; who promise to satisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreame to another, they make the Souldiours vnderstand, into what feare the Citie was driuen ; which cannot chuse but adde much infolencie to the passions already stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon growes wise, and finding the season fit, labors to make a great haruest. Many must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue lost their homes, in publique seruice of the state. The state shall pay for them. They had liued some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiuing their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat ; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians : Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in prouision ; or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it ? But this would not serue. They said that they had bene sometimes driuen to buy ; and that (since they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouision, during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that wheat had borne, whilst the Warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners ; who might easily haue bene satisfised with farre lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiuing their due at the first. But now they make none end of crauing. For whilst the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this Com-monie, the Souldiers haue deuised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater sum of money, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found of these controuersies which daily did multiply, it was thought conuenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicily, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choise of Gesco : partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africke : partly out of a dislike which they had conceived of Amilcar ; for that hee had not visited them in all this busie time. So Gesco comes among them ; and, to please them the better, comes not without money : which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calls vnto him first of all, the Captaines, and then, the seuerall Nations apart ; rebuking them gently for that which had passed ; aduising them temperately concerning the present ; and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained ned them, and would needs alwaies be mindefull of their good seruices. After this he began to put hand to his purse : offering to giue them their whole pay in hand ; and then after to consider of other reckonings at a more conuenient time. This had bene well accepted, and might haue serued to bring all to a quiet passe ; if two seditious ring-leaders of the multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a sturdie fellow, and audacious, but a slave ; that in the late war had fled from a Roman whom he serued, and therefore stood in feare, lest he should be deliuered backe to his Master ; at whose hands he could expect no less, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raising such troubles as might serue to with-draw men from care of priuate matters, and make his owne restitution impossible, were his Master neuer soim, to portunate. With Spendius there associated himselfe one Matho ; an hore-headed man, that had bene so forward in stirring up the tumult, as he could not chooseth but feare, lest his owne death should be made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behaviour. This Matho deals with his Countymen the Africans ; telling them, that they were in faire worse condition, than either the Gauls, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any fortynie mercenaries. For (saith he) *these our companions haue no more to doe, than to receive their wages, and forget them gone : but wee, that are to stay behinde in Africa, shall be called to another manner of accompt, when wee are left alone ; so that wee shall haue cause to woe, that we had returned home beggers, rather then laden with the monie, which (little though it be) shall break our backs. Tce are not ignorant, how tyrannically those our hangy Masters of Carthage doe reigne over vs. They thinke it reasonable, that our lines and goods should bee at their disposition ; which they haue at other times bene accustomed to take from vs, euen with our apparent cause, as it were to declare their Souereignie : what will they now doe, seeing that we haue demeaned our selues as free men, and been bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others haue done ? Ye all doe know, that it were a very shame for vs, if hauing bene as forward in euery danger of warre, as any other men, wee should now stand quaking like slaves, and not dars to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This notwithstanding yee may allure your selues, that we are like to be taught better manners, as soone as our fellows are gone : in regard of whom they are content to shew their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let vs therefore be wise, and consider, that they base and feare vs. Their hatred will shew it selfe, when their feare is once past : unless wee now take our time, and, whilst we are the stranger, enseeble them so greaues, that their hatred shall not be able to doe vs wrong. All their strength consisteth in monie, where withall they haue hired others against vs, & vs against others. At the present they haue neither monie nor friends. The best Armie that euer serued them, whereof we are no small part, lies at their gates, ready to helpe vs if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected : for were our sword once drawn, all Africk would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whither can they send for helpe ? The cause it selfe is plaine : but wee must quickly resolute. Either we must prevent the diligence of Geico, by incensing these Gauls and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood, or else it behooueth vs to please our good masters, by ioyning with them against our fellows. yea by offering to forgiue vnto them all our wages, if so (peradventure) they may bee wonne to forgiue vs, or not our crueltie to punish our faults committed. Hee is most worthilie a wretched slave, that neither hath care to winne his Masters loue, nor the courage to attempt his owne libertie.*

By such perswasions Matho winnes the African souldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now so greedie of monie, as of quarrell, which he that seeketh, will not misse to finde. When Geico therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horse and victuals, to some other more conuenient time, they brake into great outrage, and say that they will haue all, euen all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Matho & Spendius ; whose diligence is not wanting, to adde more fuell to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the onely men to whom the souldiers will hearken : if any other stand vp to make a speech, a shew of stoncs, flying about his eares, puts him to silence, that hee shall neuer afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say : enough hath been said already by those good spokemen ; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can bee heard, save onlie Thron, thron.

Now

Now the Rebellion begins to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captaines ; who, followed by a desperate crue of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, vnder faire pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Geico is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but adventures himselfe vpon their furie. One while he deals with the Captaines, and other principal men ; taking them by the hand, and giuing gentle words : another while hee workes with the fearefull Nations ; putting them all in hope of their own harts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so fullen as the Africans : indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorie, to giue them their owne, and not to feede them with words. The truth is, that they are not so couetous as they seeme : but will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more then Geico knows : hee sees not that Matho hath any more then bare words to bestow vpon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he tells them, That they may doe well, if they stand in want of mony, to seeke it of their Captaine, Matho. This is enough. Shall hee both defraude them and deride them ? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon themselves that he had brought ; yea vpon him also, and all that are with him : as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellowes beginne to grow calme, by his faire language : wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde ; that so the Armie may bee freed from danger of good aduention, which they call Treason. After this followes open warre. Matho solicits all Africk, and his Embassadors are euery where well entertained. Neither is it needfull to see perswasion : the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to draw the whole countrie into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions, with which they haue plagued others. It is true that aduersitie hath neuer bene vtold of her errors : and as hee euer assured to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne shee vndergoes those of other men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang vnder the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse ; that theyooke from them the one halfe of their corne, that they doubled their tributes in all things else ; and that they inflicted vpon their vassals the greatest punishment for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves haue forgotten : but the people, that haue suffered so much, retain all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely such as can beare Armes, are ready to doe seruice in this great Commotion, but the very women bring forth their Jewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for the maintenance of so iust a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberrall contribution, Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aide of threescore and tenne thousand Africans : and are moreover furnished with mony, not only to satisc the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the warre begun, though it should be of long endurance.

§. II.

Diuers obseruations vpon this warre with the mercenaries.

†. I.

Of Tyrannie, and how Tyrants are saide to use the helpe of mercenaries.

¶ Ere let vs rest a while, as in a conuenient place : whence wee may take a prospect of the subiect, over which we trauaile. Behold a tyrannicall City, persecuted by her owne mercenaries with a deadly warre. It is a common thing, as becometh almost necessarie, that a tyrannie should be vpheld by mercenary forces : it is common that mercenaries should be false : and it is common that all warre made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we seldom heare, that euer the mine of a tyrannie is procured or fought, by those that were hired to maintain the power of it : and seldom or neuer do we reade of any warre that hath been prosecuted with such inextinguishable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyrannie, is A violent forme of government, not respecting the good of the subiect, but onely the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbear to say, that it is the vniuersall rule of one ouer many : for very truly doth Cleom in Thucydides tell the

the Athenians, that their dominion over their subiects, was none other than a meere tyrannie; though it were so, that they themselves were a great Citie, and a popular estate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience, to one regardlesse of his life and welfare; vnlesse himselfe be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremity: for some Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very slaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Ruler's discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of severall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to bee restrained with any limits of respect. Why should hee seeke out bounds to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, he should haue riches in goodly abundance. Hee hath taken a great deale from euery one: but euery one could haue spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, & now he hathenough: but (as Cato saith) is neuer satisfied. He thinks that all this is too little for a stocke, though it were indeed a good yearly Income. Therefore he deuise new tricks of robbie, and is not better pleased with the gaine, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knows it well: but he thinks by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none vnjustly, he may be said to deale craftily; but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in feare, since the Traitor is no worke rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore hee can thinke vpon none other security, than to disarme all his Subiects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire as many lustie Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not be of his owne Countrey: for if not euery one, yet someone or other might chance to haue a feeling of the publique miserie. This considered, he allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vnthrift that can be found; such as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to support him, by whose onely fauor they are maintained. Now left any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth giue, should be drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as hee doth; to robbe, to rauish, to murder, and to satiate their owne appetites, in most outrageous manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hatefull to all men else. Considering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some Englishman perhaps that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this lease, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This isto shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in neede of mercinarie Souldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured vnto the Tyrant.

†. II.

That the tyrannie of a Citie over her Subiects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise vse mercinarie Souldiers.

Now concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subiects; it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is ialous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life: the lesse need hath she therefore, to secure herselfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures; and therefore needs the lesse, to plucke from her Subiects. If warre, or any other great occasion, drive her to necessity, of taking from her Subiects more than ordinarie summes of money: the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed, no wrongs are so grieuous & hatefull, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperour, to to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Iuuenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her slaues; that whilst she was whipping them, shee painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subiects, are free from all fence of indignity: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of liberty make them weane of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villanie, as a Dionysius or Agasthenes must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serue to proue, that a Citie is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

Altho this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heauie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Not without some apparence of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall haue neede of the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lasciuious, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his grauity, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtisins, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common practice, and generall approued custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State, not by the private vertue or vice of any one man; nor by metaphysicall abstraction the vniuersall from the singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I haue said elsewhere) that it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, then vnder many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to leaue downe: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soeuer, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners, his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident, may reforme him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his successe may proue better.

Many Tyrants haue bene changed into worthy Kings: and many haue ill vied their ill-gotten Dominion, which becoming hereditary to their posterity, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Government, euen a lawfull Monarchy. But they that liue vnder a tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hope: their Mistresse is immortal, and will not slacken the reines, vntill they be pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightier Chariotier. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindefull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall vpon the same fore, out of which, others had already sucked their fill. A new Gouernor comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home empty to their huius, without a good lading of waxe and honey. These flie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with euery mans wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Prouince, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becoming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he seareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to winne their friendship, were an endless labour (yet it must be vndergone) and such as euery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what aualleth it? The loue of one Gouernour is purchased with gifts: the Successor of this man, he is more louing than could be wished, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goes, who seeks the ruine of all that haue bene toward with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple, but intricad (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Reuery, against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it serued not wholly to restrain their Prouinciall Gouernours; who presuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bolde in their Prouinces to worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of iudgement. If the subiects of Rome groined vnder such oppressions, what must we thinke of those that were vassals vnto Carthage? The Romanes imposed no burthen some tributes; they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens, for hauing bene ill Gouvernours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: the rapines newly deuised by one Magistrate, serued as Presidents to instruct another; every man resolu'd to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and hee was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice, are not wanting: the government of Verrus the Roman in Sicily, that is lively set out by Tullie, may serue to informe vs, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in feare of no such condemnation, as Verrus vnder-went. By prosecuting this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Proposition: That a Citie cannot gouerne her subiect Provinces so mildly, as a King: but it is enough to haue shewed, That the tyrannie of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Surtable to the crueltie of such Lords, is the hatred of their subiects: and againe, suitable to the hatred of the subiects, is the iealousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vse the seruice of African souldiers; in Africa it selfe, they had rather be beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick Warre, shift his mercenaries out of their own Countries; ¶ In Afrin Hispania, Hispania in Africa, melior procul ab domo futurus ceteris milibus, velut mutuis pignoris obligati stipendia facerent; That the Africans might serue in Spain, the Spaniards in Africa, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the further they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confess, whether these African, and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subiect vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not onely by reward, but by duetie. Yet seeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meer desire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand vpon proprietic of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the vse of mercenarie Souldiers, and forraigne Auxiliaries.

THE extreame danger, growing from the impliment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, deuourers, and destroyers of all places and countries, whereinto they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their owne commoditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they haue often, and in time of greatest extremity, not onely refused to fight, in their defence, who haue entertained them, but reuolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that haue trusted them. These Mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King wonne the Realme of Naples, with his Buckler without a sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queene Ioane of Naples, abandoned her seruice on the sudden; and forced her to put her selfe into the hands of the King of Arragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race Duke of Millan; who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his slaues; even with the very same Armie which themselves had leuied for their owne defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the iust iudgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in losing his whole Estate by the treacherie of such faithlesse Mercenaries, as his owne Father had bene. For, hauing waged an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Dutchie, together with his person, into their hands; hee was by them deliuered vp vnto his enemy the French King, by whom hee was inclosed in the Castle of Loches vnto his dying day.

The like inconuenience is found, in vsing the helpe of forreigne Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperour of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes against his neighbour Princes; hee could neuer, either by perswasion or force, get them againe out the Sea vpon Asia side: which gaue beginning to the Christian seruitude; that soon after followed.

followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, fought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, the same Alexander, who had inuited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracuse the Turke was called into Aegypt by Samar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Aegypt, that Saladine his Successor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we looke about for examples of this kinde? Euery Kingdome, in effect, can furnish vs. The Brittaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland: but the one and the other soon became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

Against all this may bee alleaged, the good successe of the vnited Provinces of the Netherlands, vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeed these Low Countries haue many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they haue seldome been able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek helpe abroad: and the like necessitie made them forbear to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monie raised by their Trade, they maintained the Warre: and therefore could ill spare vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they typed well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mercenarie Souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowick of Nassau, felt to his griefe, in his retreat from Greeningham; when in the very instant, that required their seruice in fight, his mercenaries cried out aloud for monie, and so ranne away. This was not the onely time, when the hired souldiers of the States, haue either fought to hide their cowardize vnder a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by meer couetousnesse, haue ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to proue this by many examples: for they themselves will not denie it. Neither would I touch the honor of Monseigneur the Duke of Anion, brother to the French King; saue that it is follie to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraigne Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monseigneur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrey, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke sponthe peoples necke? Well, he liued to repent it, with griefe enough. Euen whilst hee was counterfeiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginative sorrow for the poore burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeking the Towne to bee surpris'd and wonne; the death of the Count S. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne troups, informed him better what had hapned; shewing that they were his owne French, who stood in need of pittie. Then was his feigned passion changed, into a very bitter angur of minde; wherein, lining his brest, and wringing his hands, hee exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulx tu faire de moy; Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not serue to proue, that there is little danger in vsing mercenarie souldiers, or the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding, they were obedient vnto necessity, and sought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger, when the Queen of England refused to accept the Soueraignty of their Countrey, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continual warre; when the heire of England reigned in Scotland, a King too iust & wise (though not engaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his own inheritance: then might the Netherlands very safely repose confidence, in the forces of these their Neighbour-Countries. The souldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not onely regardfull of the pay that they should receiue, but well affected vnto the cause that they tooke in hand: or if any were cold in his deuotion, vnto the side whereon hee fought; yet was hee kept in order, by remembrance of his owne home, where the English would haue rewarded him with death; if that his faith had bene corrupted by

by the Spaniards. They were therefore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessity of the poorer sort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbor-Country, of the same Religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: then may such a Countrie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldom, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercinarie, and forraigne auxillarie forces, are no lesse dangerous, than the enemye, against whom they are entertained.

†. III.

That the moderate government of the Romanes gave them assurance to use the service of their owne subjects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the use and benefit of the like moderation.

Here may it be demanded, whether also the Romanes were not compelled to violence of other souldiours in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne Citizens? for if their manner to arme their owne subjects, how happened it that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they avoid the inconveniences aboute rehearsed? The answer is; That their Armies were compounded vntually of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equall number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subjects, as were either interested in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times (though seldom they did employ so many,) ten Romane Legions; a good strength, if all other helps had beene wanting: which served to keepe in good order their subjects, that were alwaies fewer in the Army than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priuileges and immunities, which they enioyed, made them assured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they liued almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how easie focer, seemest trouble some to the necke that hath beene accustomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of seuerall aduantages, to deliuer themselves from the Romane subiection. But still they haue been reclaimed by Warre; the Authors of rebellion haue sharply bin punished; and the people by degrees, haue obtained such libertie, as made them citeeme none other wise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italie. Yea, in proceesse of time it was granted vnto many Cities, that all the Burgeses should be free of Rome itselfe. This favor was conferred absolutely vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had beene wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readie way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the reuiew of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking inuouation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romanes good government, That when some, for their well-deseruing, haue had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome, they haue refused it, and held themselves better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Petellia, a Citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremities of warre, than vpon any condition, to forsake the Romans; euen when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subjects, and therefore willed them to look to their owne good, as hauing beene faithfull to the vnto. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning therunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other helpe of their owne subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the propriety of Rome to be the common good.

vnto their Lords, and consequentie, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seeme strange, that the practice of tyrannie, whose effects are contrarie, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said, of all Vice, and Irregularity whatsoever. For it is lesse difficult (whosoever thinke otherwise and more wise, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honesty, than to turne aside from it; yet commonly our passions do leade vs into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same vntuly appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least wile maketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is not so: for as much as we may hardly desire the passion, that is of force to infigure it selfe into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seldom beene hereditarie, or long-lasting; but haue ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which meanes the government hath beene reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That Tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? Why did the Athenians? Why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good, how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were ledde hereunto by any affection, what was that affection wherein to many thousand Citizens, diuided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diuersitie of temper, and the vehemencie of priuate hatred among them? Doubtlesse, we must bee faine to say, That Tyrannie is, by it selfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankind, are common likewise vnto brut beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are giuen by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewise naturally, in conuenient measure, both vnto Mankind, and to all creatures that haue sense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: euen so is this desire of ruling or obeying, engrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuile forme of Iustice. All these in-bred qualities are good and vselfull. Neuertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttonie and Drunkennesse, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an vnproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthy creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than vnto brut beasts, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grievously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull vnto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraved Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath beene an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or That nothing should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and over-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary diltemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremitie of either, no Countrie is able to subsist: yet the defective dulnesse, that permitteeth any thing, will also permitte the execution of Law, to which, meere necessity doth enforce the ordinarie Magistrate; whereas Tyrannie is more active, and pleaseth it selfe in the exercise, with a false colour of iustice. Examples of stupiditye, and vnaptnesse to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are euery where to be found: for this quality troubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some error of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome some friend or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltye doth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknewne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to bee knowne, but would be reputed honorable: for it is prosperum by felix scelus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned vnto those, that know how to increase, or preserve humane nature: all honours, greatness, riches, dignities, empires, triumphs, trophies, are appointed for these, that know how to flourish, to trouble, or destroy it. Cesar and Alexander, have vnto made and slaine, each of them, more then a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the error of Mans judgement, in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyrannic, when it growes to ripenesse, is none other, than Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to bee worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeede all other vices, issuing from the Passions incident both to Man and Beast, no lesse than Perurie, Murder Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villanie, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Polycompes, that vied their bodily force to the destruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius and Agathocles, whose mischievous heads were cast by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these later Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference between Freeman, and slaves.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is as the dominion of Reason ouer Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can haue ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterlie rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when hee said; Hee dominion ouer the fish of the Sea, and ouer the fowle of the aire; and every living thing that moueth vpon the earth: which also he cominueth vnto Noah, and his children, saying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, shall be vpon every beast of the earth, and vpon every foule of the aire, vpon all that moueth vpon the earth, and vpon all the fishes of the Sea; into your hands are they deliuered. He who gaue this dominion vnto Man, did giue also an appetite to vse it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a vnerie part of Mankinde. There are indeede no small numbers of men, whose dilabillie to gouerne themselves, prooueth them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to be natural³⁰ lie slaves.

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppresse men with bondage: vnlesse the lawfullnesse thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a seruant, whom hee hath slaine by correction, if the seruant liue a day or two, because he is his monie; or else by the captiuitie of the Midianites gyles, which were made bond-slaves, and the Sanctuarie had a part of them for the Lord tribute. Doubtlesse the custome hath bene very ancient: for Noah laid this curse vpon Canaan, that he should be a seruant of seruants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men seruants and maid seruants, which were none other then slaves. Christian Religion is said to haue abrogated this olde kinde of seruilitie: but surely, they are deceived that thinke so. Saint Paul desired the libertie of Onesimus, whom hee had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, crauing it as a benedict, nor vrging it as a dutie. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giueth vnto seruants: Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called: art thou called, being a seruant? care not for it, but if thou maist be made free, vse it rather. It is true, that Christian religion hath procured libertie vnto many: not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in feare, of being discovered by their slaves, vnto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drew many vnto his impetie: but whether he forbade it, as vnlawfull, vnto his sectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; saue that by the practice of the Turks and Moors, it seemes hee did not. In England we had many bond-servants, vntill the time of our last ciuill warres: and I thinke that the Lawes concerning Villages are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which were of great vnto and seruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Curpeses and other the like Trades; slaves in Nature, though not in Lawe.

But whether this kinde of dominion be lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well prooued, that it is naturall. And certainly wee finde not such a latitude of difference in any creature, creature, as in the nature of man: wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate of the dect and reprobate) the wisest excell the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpass the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath giuen way to Reason: we shall finde that Nature is the ground even of Masterly power, and of seruile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some countries haue subsisted long, without the vse of any seruilitie: as also it is true, that some countries haue not the vse of any tame cattell. Indeede the affections which vphold ciuill rule, are (though more noble) not so simply needefull, vnto the sustentation either of our kinde, as are Lust, and the like; or of euery one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile, and seruile dispositions, haue liberty to shew themselves begging in the streets; there may we more iustly wonder, how the dangerous toyle of sea-faring men can finde enough to vnderake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by access of those, that are weary of their owne more painfull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted euen by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall custome of Nations doth subscribe, together with the pleasure which most men take in thatters, that are the basest of slaves.

This being so, we finde no cause to maruaile, how Tyranny hath bene so rise in all ages, and practised, not onely in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but euer by consim of whole Cities and Estates: since, other vices haue likewise gotten head, and borne a generall sway, notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that haue vied well the inferior Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? In the gouernment of wife and children, some are vterly carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull conuiniencie; others, by masterly rigour, hold their owne blood vnder condition of slavery. To be a good Gouernour is a rare commendation; and to preserve the Weale publike aboute all respects whatsoeuer, is the Vertue iustly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages afford not many examples. Hector is named by Aristotle, as one of them, and deservedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, vied in defence of a mans owne countrie. But if we consider, that a loue of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountain of all goodnesse: we shall finde, that no Morall vertue, how great soeuer, can, by it selfe, deserue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; such as Dauid, Isaphat, and Isayas were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the world would soone be happy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due; or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can finde a King religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement either of aduersitie, or of some regard of state; a procurer of the generall peace and quiet; who not onely vse his authoritie, but adde the trauell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Iudges to doe iustice; by the vigorous influence of whose Gouernment, ciuilitie is infused, euen into those places, that haue bene the dens of savage Robbers and Cutthroates; one that hath quite abolished a slavish Brehon Law, by which an whole Nation of his subiects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdom doth make the praise not onely of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wines, and the goods, of those that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appeare lesse regardable; he, I say, that can finde such a King, findeth an example, worthy to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder such a King, it is likely by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknowne; that Ciuilitie and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subiects, shall gaule the Nations farre off removed, to wish him their Soueraigne. I neede not adde hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, euen his bodily exercises, doe partake of vertue; since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the multiplying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, seeketh how to imitate the vnspokeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible malice, with both of which himselfe is indied, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong, to the furtherance of that common good, which he procureth. Lest any man should thinke me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reason; I adde herto, hereunto, that such a King is neuertheless a man, must die, and may erre: yet wil dome and same shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit (though there be many other besides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruit of his goodnesse. The people that liue vnder a pleasant yoke, are not onely loyng to their Soueraigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muster of men, then of stout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as ouer slaues, shall be attended in time of necessity, by flauith mindes, neither loyng his person, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may be furious, and slaues outrageous, for a time: but among spirits that haue once yielded vnto slavery, vnuerfally it is found true, that Homer saith, God becauseth a man of halfe his vertue, that day when hee casteth him into bondage.

Hem. Ody. l. 17

O! these things, I might perhaps more seasonably haue spoken, in the general discourse of Government: but where so liuely an example, of the calamity following a tyrannical rule, and the vse of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it selfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuell, than being barely deliuered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the warre against the Mercenaries was diuersly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable successe. The bloody counsailes of the Mercenaries; and their small destruction.

* Vtica is seated in the great Bay that enters towards Carthage, not farre from the Promontorie of Apello. At this time it is called Porto Fartina, or Biserta, &c. by the also doth.Africanthem-fellies, Garet.Molte, Niger faith, that the Towne itselfe is ruined, and the place, whereon it stood, now called Matzacha. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, faith Silius. As he is fortified before Carthage was, so he did it after Carthage was thrown down by the Romans, in the third Punicke Warre. Famous it was by the death of Cato the younger, who held it against Cicero Victor, that worthy Diuine, was Bishop thereof in the time of the Consul the Arrian: who liued all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the storie of his cruelties.

BEing now to returne vnto those Mercenaries, from whom I haue thus farre digressed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seeketh their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiniers. Had they all bene subjects vnto Carthage, then might they iustly haue bene termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeouored to subuert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius

These vsing the aduantage of their present strength, besieged * Vtica, and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated vpon the western Hauens of Carthage, where it is diuided by a necke of land; Hippagreta standing inwards vpon the great Lake, Vtica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes abandoned, which lay fitly to hinder the Carthaginians, from passing vp into the countrey: for Mattho and Spendius wanted not men, to follow the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may conceiue. But the businesse it selfe awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides, and therefore it auailed their braynes to the vttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came vnto the very walls of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together what focuer was needfull, as well to relieue a Towne besieged, as to batter and assaile any place defended against him. With these prouisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came vnto Vtica, so suddenly, that the enemies as men surpris'd, forsooke their Trenches, and retir'd themselves vnto a rising peece of woody ground, wherethey might be safe against the violence of his beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Namidian, whose custome was, after any losse, to flee two or three whole dayes iourney off; presently entered the Towne; to shew himselfe, after this his victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was to warre, had leamed of Amilcar, to retire and to fight againe, many times so in one day, as neede required. Therefore as soone as they perceiued, that he knew not how to vie a victory; they assailed their owne Campe, and with great slaughter, drave the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves within Vtica; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This had beginning Hanno followed with suitable indiscretion: loosing the benefit of many faire opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

The

The Carthaginians, perceiuing this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their shere anchor; sending to the field their great Capitaine, Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foot of supply, and seuerie Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meete with the enemy vpon equall ground. For besides other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to win the onely Bridge, by which the Riuer Mactra, or Bagradas, was passable vnto these, that were to traualle into the Continent. This Riuer had not many foords, nor those easie for a single man to get ouer: but vpon them all was kept such guard, as gaue to Amilcar little hope of preuailling in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it selfe, Mattho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Towne, where in to ly commodiously, intentiue onely to the custody thereof. But Amilcar had obserued, that the very mouth of Bagradas vsed to be sometimes cloyed with sand and grauell, that was driuen in by certaine customarie winde, and could not be driuen out againe, by force of that slow Riuer, till the winde falling, or changing, suffered the weight of the wanes, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made vse; and taking his opportunitie, pulled the Riuer, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come ouer Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the new s; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the imprudent grauity of Hanno, but with an able spirit, euen with their owne Master in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was soone changed into presumption; when more than fiftene thousand of their owne society, were come from Vtica; and other ten thousand from the gard of the Bridge. Their Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne iudgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they resolu'd to charge him on all sides, and beate him downe, in despite of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended vpon him, watching for some aduantage, and still exhorting one another to play the men, and giue the onie. Especially they that followed him in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; wherevpon their promptnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fittest for the seruice of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Armie. Neither made he shew of any desier to fight, but suffered the rashnesse of his enemies to increafe, till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldnesse than goodherde, they followed him so neere, as would be little for their good, if hee should tame vpon them, he hastened his march, euen to such a pace, as made a shew little differing from plaine flight. The Mercenaries presently fell vpon his skirts; beleeuing, that for feare of them he was ready to run away. But whilst they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victory, were driving at the heeles of those that had the Reare; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, so that amazed with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrow, there were fixe thousand of the Mercenaries slaine, and about two thousand taken, the rest fled, some to the Campe at Vtica, others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he wan the place easily; the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not hauing recollect'd their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Towns reuolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Mattho wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Namidia and Africke, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or neuer to doe their best, for the recovery of their freedome; he perswaded Spendius, and Ausartus that was Capitaine of the Gauls, to wait vpon Amilcar, and alwayes to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and he himselfe continued to presse the Towne of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessary for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take such wayes as there were: for all the Countrey lay not leuell. Therefore Spendius, who still coulted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, surrounded with hils, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their

Namidian

Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie, the fame of Amilcar his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrie. For Naraulus, a yong gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occasion seruing to get the acquaintance and loue of so braue a man, which he much desired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all seruice. Amilcar ioyfully entertained this friend; promised vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wan from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naraulus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approach his owne valour, to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were slaine tenne thousand of Spendius his fellows, and foure thousand taken prisoners; but Spendius himselfe, with Autarius the Gauls, escaped to doe more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were vntoiling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake this Couenant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Autarius, as tending to win from them, the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safetie, whilst Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company respectiue onely of their priuate benefit, and carelesse of the generall good, had a purpose to betray them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; & that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Gesco, and his companions, whom these traitours had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oratio to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelitie; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanitie of Amilcar, toward some, was none other than a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enemy Gesco would proue, if he might escape their hands. While he is yet in the midst of his tale, were letters come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autarius, and speaks his minde plainly: saying, that were the best, yea the onely way, for the common safetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desiring to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Gesco his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such a course euery one should be engaged in the present Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that such as would speake here against, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autarius was in great credit with the souldiers, and could speake sundry languages, in such sort, that he was vnderstood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gesco, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuertheless there were some, that for loue of Gesco, sought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewith all contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be serued in like sort: and that the subjects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they obserued euer afterwards.

Of this cruelty I neede say no more, than that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsaile of viding it, it was like vnto the counsaile of Achitophel; All Israel shall beare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellows, if they be more innocent; and to auoide the punishment of leffe offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull spirits of those that haue bene wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added, some deficiency of Lawes, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to the decree of their severall crimes. A coward thinks all punishment too little for his owne securitie. If Phocas be a coward (saide the Emperour Mauritius) then is he murderous. To be stedfast and sure, in taking reuenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defensatiue against new iniuries. But wrongfully: for it is oppositie to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwile would haue repented, and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect euen their gentleness, as the introduction to extreame rigour. Like vnto the errors of Princes and Gouvernours, are the errors of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment, is awarded vnto the leffe offence, and vnto the greater, he that hath aduertured to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

Against these inconueniences Mercy and Seueritie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his owne souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courses; his humanity was ready to intemperate. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and shame, he rewarded their villanie with answerable vengeance; casting them vnto wilde beasts, to be deuoured.

Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilcar, and done little, as may seeme, for that nothing is remembered of him, since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his helpe, as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremity, as threatened vnto ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he ioyned his forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more then in former times: rather he could now performe nothing, such was the hatred betwene him and his vnworthy Colleague. The Towns of Pitta and Hippagreta, that had stood alwaies firme on the Carthaginian party, did now reuolt vnto the enemy, murdering all the souldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The provisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost in foul weather: and Carthage it selfe stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

In that in all Ages beene vsed, as the safest course, to send forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities, Athen and Rome, which other States and Princes haue often imitated; perswading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will vse the greater diligence. They haue also ioyned two chiefe Commanders in equall commission, vpon this further consideration; the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For heretofore all Common-weales haue bene iealous, hauing bene taught by their examples that haue made themselves Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that haue employed them. In this point, the Venetians haue bin so circumspect, as they haue for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, serueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them trust: but in manning the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made neere vnto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could giue) was to be obtained by that one yeeres seruice; it is no maruaile, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end then victory. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise then was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeede the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vnlesse one business seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be ioyned in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times preuaile with their ioynt Generals: yet was this neuer or seldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often bene such, that the lesse able Capitaine, though of equall authority, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they haue many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armie, received great and most dangerous overthrowes; whereof in the second Punic warre we shall finde examples. On the contrary side, in their warres most remote, that were alwayes managged by one, they seldome failed failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those ten Generals, which serued the Athenians at the Battaille of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper beene better, than the iudgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades: their affaires had found the same success which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicily: the one being so ouer-warie, and the other so hasty, as all came to nought that they undertooke; whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, hauing sole charge of all, did their Countie and common-weale most remarkable seruice. For it is hard to finde two great Capitaines, of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of sinitie than of iudgement, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often ouerslipped, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was slaine after the Battaille of Iarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an aduancement, than an hindrance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one, out-reach the aduisednesse of the other, as whatsoeuer the Admirall intended to win by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduirtured to lose, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we neede no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present businesse: who, though they were still sicke of their ill-grounded loue to Hanno, and were vnwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armie that serued vnder them. The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Campe: which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Armie neere vnto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduventure much; hauing in their Campe about fiftie thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neuertheless, the Citie was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of victualles they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Eueron, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicily hee assisted the Romans, and still continued in their Alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne; because if no other State gaue the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principalltie of Syracuse would soone be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some slender assistance, and for the present refused good offers made vnto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a kinde of noble disposition; which was indeede but counterfeite, as the sequelle manifestly proued.

Whilest Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligent, in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more tightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issued into the field: when Spendius, and one Zartas an African Capitaine assisting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilcar worke; leauing Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naransus, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himselfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it selfe, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemy to many skirmishes; in all which the success was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus hee continued, prouoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giuing them the overthrow in plaine battaille: vntill at length hee got them into a streight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough, to perceiue their owne disadvantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomack to fight;

fight; but awaiting for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might reach them, to dare impossibilities, vied the benefit of their present feare, and shut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that came not: and hauing spent all their victualles, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deserved any fauour from Carthage: and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindfull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremity, that they were faine to deuoure their owne companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken, and they threatened their Capitaines with what they deserved, vnlesse they would goe forth to Amilcar, and seeke such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zartas, and Antarius, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than perish by the hands of their owne Companions. Hereupon they sent to craue parley, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilcar in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seemes that they tooke the blame vpon themselves, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single cocate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chose them: presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon so gentle articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to armes. But they wanted Capitaines to order them; and the same astonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilcar both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being forie thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage, and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africa. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naransus and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeelde: Pica and Hippagreta, onely standing out, vpon feare of deferred vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of the enemy. Coming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the wals; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in armes. With this rigor the siege began; as if speedy victory had beene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too far asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the wals beheld his owne destinie, in the misery of his companion, and knew no how to auoide it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So hee brake ouerpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with so great and vnexpected furie hee sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, hee tooke Hannibal prisoner, on whom, and thirtie the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, hee presently reuenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had hee strength enough remaining, after this great losse, to continue the siege; but was faine to make it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where hee incamped.

The terror was no lesse within Carthage, vpon the same of this losse, than had beene the ioy of the late great victory. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, vnder Hanno; whom, it seemes, they thought the most able of their Capitaines foruiuing the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the imployment of one sole Generall, neere vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue tried one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hasty exigent, to deuise about repealing it. But thirtie principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar's camp: & by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day.

It neerely touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed vnto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Neethertheless after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilest this warre lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the meane season Matho was come abroad, as meaning to vse the reputation of his late success, whilest it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did; but he wanted skill to deal with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so farre abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho, that he resolved to try the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his owne desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matho: as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approved it selfe in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, wherein the enemy hath nor what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: inuiting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the field all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this battaile might haue beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring spirits, which had been well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as hauing beene often victorious; and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be marched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of liberty should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once engaged in that aduventure. So the Carthaginians wan a great victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matho himselfe was taken alive. Immediately vpon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Vtica onely, and Hippagreta stoop out, as knowing how little they deserved fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victours. Matho and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had lasted three yeeres, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians: whose subjects did not loue them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, haue prevented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Islanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

Hilfest Matho and Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bolifar the Governour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their owne vse. Against these, one Hanno was sent with a small Armie (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuiued on the sudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to ioyne themselves with those that were already revolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all ielousie and distrust, they resolved to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with those that haue vndertaken the quarrell of an vnjust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villanous act, to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they haue in hand. It is indeede the best pawne, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some such actions, as are equally vnardonable to all.

By such a kinde of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantinsians murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent vnto them for their defence against the Lacedaemonians, by Aratus; who, when hee had formerly posselt himselfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did not onely spare the sacke and spoyle thereof, but gaue them equall freedom with the rest of the Citie vnted. These Results are also common in our Court-warres; where, in the conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, without the dejection or destruction of old friends, we cannot be receiued and trusted by old enemies. Ce sont les coups de vieille ecrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

The Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: onely they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Islanders were no lesse glad, than the souldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrey: but they could not agree about the price of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the souldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) haue risen, betweene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends, if the common desire of both had once taken effect: vnlesse the riches of Carthage had serued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrey; the matter was not easily taken vp. So they fell to blowes, which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to saue themselves in Italie. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it, with as good right, as the Mantertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refused, vpon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with corne: of whom the Carthaginians tooke almost fise hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all provisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vtica, offering it selfe vnto their subiection. This might haue serued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the issue proued, that it was meerere of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thiuing better thereby, than they should haue done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had beene ouerthrowne by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie must either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of mercilesse villains, or haue humbled her selfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately struen for superiority. That extreme necessity, wherinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage, was not farre from such a miserable choyce. Wherefore it was not vnwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a rich, but sinking shippe, to runne her selfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feete againe; began to strike at her head. They continued the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre against this enfeebled and impouerished Citie, vnder a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeede against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to resist; and therefore yielded to the Roman demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelve hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see nor what reason they could alledge) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuasion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently fought occasion of warre. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paid, how hardly fouer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punic faith, in breach of Covenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

§. V.

How the affaires of Carthage went betwene the African Rebellion, and the second Punicke warre.

His iniurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell, serued to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson. That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolute to be obedient vnto those that were more mighty. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination easily tooke place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increafe of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the ialousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts vpon the Mediterranean seas; but the riches of Spain, that lay vpon the Ocean, were unknowne to Rome: wherefore that Province might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decayed forces, with all needefull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and soueraine trust was committed vnto Amilcar: vpon whom his Countrie did wholly repose it selfe, in hope to recouer strength by his means, that had saued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to be the most worthy of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; aduising men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weale, they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable seruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Countrie. He passed the Streights of Straites, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar): and landed on the westerne coasts of Spain; in which Countrie, during nine yeeres that he liued there, he subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Prouinces. But finally, in a battaile that hee fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) he was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, hee had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in prudence and cunning than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding to many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow ialous againe of this haile increafe. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdome of Granada, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it neerey retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but begin to caule their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicily, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbering themselves in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) giuen them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuence, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be inuaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and nereest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if he request, since his request shall haue the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans vtterly destitute of all good colour, that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace betwene these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had bene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceede any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they seeme to haue hoped, that howeuer the generalitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pillles, so would all occasion of warre with Rome: yet the brauery of one man might proue more stubborn, and resisting the iniurie, returne such answere, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would haue this insolent countenance inserted into the articles of peace, he tooke vpon him to doe it, of his owne power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

It had bene so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal, yet should it not haue stood bound in honour, to obserue the same carefully, vnlesse an oath had also beene sworn, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, vnder the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace, whereof the Romans might be accused more iustly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perurie, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treatie with Asdrubal, the Romans wan some reputation in Spain. For when it was once concurred by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needs be mistrusted ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiuing blows from a stouter Dame; there were some found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-seruants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entered into confederacie with the Romans, & were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subiect, nor open enemy in warre to the Carthaginians) into their societie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Neuerthelesse, if we consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal, we shall finde that the Romans could haue none other honest color of requiring it, than an implicit covenant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themselves would not passe, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spain: in which regard, they might haue some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that Riuer, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoever it were, this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former iniuries had bene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginians, should behold Saguntum resting securely amongst them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mighty Citie. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight yeeres: (being slaine by a flauie, whose master hee had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

not what reason they could alleadge) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuasion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of warre. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paid, how hardly soeuer it was raised. Neertheless, if we consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal, we shall finde that the Romans could haue none other honest color of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themselves would not passe, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spain: in which regard, they might haue some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that Riuer, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoeuer it were, this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former iniuries had bene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginians, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mighty Citie. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the least iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight yeeres: (being slaine by a slave, whose master hee had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

§. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reigne of Philip the sonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punic warre, and the vacation following, betweene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though faire weaker, as in an after-spring. The whole countrie had recovered by degrees, a forme of libertie: the petty tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Capitaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not onely serued to defend themselves, but to giue protection to others. This conseruation to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had bene in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gauls: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirtie yeeres; yetso, that he was diuers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gauls, and by Pyrrhus, as hath bene already shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father hee had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of his souldiours, euen at such time, as hauing ouerthrowne with great slaughter an Armie of the Gauls, hee was conuerting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to recue his Garrisons. But his young sonne Demetrius raised an Armie, wherewith he chased Alexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kinde) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was iustly termed the Gate of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood vpon a steepe rockie hill on the North side of the towne, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the towne, which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betweene the Argear and Ionique Seas, toyneth Peloponnesus to the maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Citadell, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the sonne of Polyperchon, and after his death, Crateipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Townes, that was made betweene Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to be poysoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The device was this. Antigonus sent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicea, and seeke her marriage. The foolish old widdow perceived not how vnfit a match hee was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage, where-to the old King was euen as ready, to consent, as was his sonne to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the middelt of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Citadell, beguiling the poore Lady, whose ialousie had bene exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauity becoming his old age. But as hee had stollen it; so was it againe stollen from him: neither liued he to reuenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the sonne of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King than after. The Dardanians, Atolians, and Acheans, held him continually busied in warre; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Gracians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the onely sonne of Demetrius, was a yong childe when his father died, and therefore Antigonus, his vncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince.

Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his owne sonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Dolon, that is as much as, Will-gie, because he was slow in his liberaltie. He repressed the Dardanians and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reigne. Vpon confidence of this good service, he took stare vpon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, then onely a Protector. Heereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appeased by faire words, and a seeming vnwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Gouerment. The Acheians tooke from him the City of Athen, soone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to hate wrought him out of all, or most that hee held in Greece, if their owne estate had not bin endangered by a neerer enemy. But euill dissention, which had ouerthrowne the powert of Greece, when it flourished most; ouerthrew it casily now againe, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sicknesse; and gave to this Antigonus no lesse authoritie therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

The Acheians from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equallitie of their Lawes; and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not onely draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus to be gouerned by one Law, and to vse one and the same sort of waights, measure, and monie.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had bene by the Macedonian Captaines diuided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subiected themselves, after the descent of the Heracidae, when Tismenus the sonne of Orestes possessed the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance, with some small changes according to the diuersitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturnd all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Eraor Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a litle before the Battaille of Leuctres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from each other, and trained into a warre, no lesse foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomies the sonne of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomie Ceraunus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patenses and the Dimai, vnited themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For hauing bene, some of them Partisans with sundrie Macedonian Capitaines, and others hauing bene gouerned by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italie. Now after the vnting of the Patenses and Dimai, to whom also the Cities of Tritea, and Phara, ioyned themselves; Agira chased out her Garrisons: and the Enriens, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twentie and five yeeres, vsed the same forme of Gouerment with the Acheians; who by a Senatorie and two Prators, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and soone after, by one Prator, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynes was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble yong Gentleman of Sicyon, who liuing at Argos in exile, whilst his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wife in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entred into the Achaian league: which though at that time it receiued more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this coniunction serued well enough against against Antigonus, whose subtiltie was somewhat greater than his valor. As the industry and counsaile of Aratus deliuered his Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league; so further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great cost of 150. talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuersies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, & the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Landes, as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolomy Euergettes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conuersation of Aratus himselfe, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadel of Corinth; which he warneby night, being thereto guided by some theeres that hee had hired for the purpose, who liuing in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasure, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was hee faine to fight for it, ere hee could get it: though indeede Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouer-come by their owne feare, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and hauing lost the advantages of the place already, vpon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kinde of night-seruices, ambushments, surprisings, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, hee was astimorous. By this strange mixture of cowardice and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others: Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approach) might look pale and tremble, when he began battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diminished, by the sundry natures of men, & in a manner confined, vnto several sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said, that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination stand in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vse, good success, and other helps, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Countrey hee was vnreprouable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will truely testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soon: after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Trezenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new created State grew so powerfull, that it aduentured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos & Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprise vpon Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ranfome, to allure the Citie by shew of loafe; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest flues to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more strongly. The Achaians came somerimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entered it, and might haue wonne it, if the Citizens would haue lent any helpe to the recouerie of their own freedome; sundry times, and with diuers euents, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose vp one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battaile; but all sufficed not: vntill at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perswaded, and hired, by Aratus, that hee consented to resigne his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phliasians.

Whilst this businesse with the Argives was on foot, Lysias the Tyrant of Megalopolis was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, hee gaue liberie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that hee was chosen Generall of their forces (which was a yeerely Office, and might not be held two yeeres together by one person): euery second yeere, for a certaine while, he and Aratus succeeded one another by turns. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysias and Aristomachus, were carried with priuate passion from care of the generall good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appeare in due time.

The

The Achaians hauing obtained so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolomy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land; made open Warre vpon Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus Governor, for the libertie of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battaile, the Achaians wore Garlands, in signe of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonne the victorie. Such were now the Achaians become; in whom the rule was verified, that hold true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter seruit, aut superbe dominatur; It is either base in seruise, or insolent in command. Neuert helesse when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by monie, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Capitaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaians, louing them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne glorie.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by iustice and honestie; so did the Achaians, in the vnder part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it selfe, waxe very powerfull, by sturdinesse of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had stoutly defended themselves against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to doe and suffer much; partly by the naturall strength and fastnesse of their Countrey; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captaines to other businesse, as hath bene related. They had molested Cassander, in fauour of Antigonus; and were themselves as much plagued by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little, but a stout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius, the sonne of the first Antigonus, and more or lesse, with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often Warre with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were brinded with perpetuall trauaile; seldom putting off their Armour. But their hardnesse ill deserved the name of valor, seeing they had no regard of honesty or friendship; measuring all things by their owne insolent will, and thinking all people base-minded; that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.

These Achaians had lately made great spoyles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the Countrey. They had invaded the friends of the Achaians; taken and sacked Palene, where although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gaine made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Countrey wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus Gonatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driuen to seeke helpe of the Achaians; which they obtained. The warre which the Achaians made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedonians out of Greece; yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the Achaians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuered from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Achaians, giving thanks in words, deuised how to requite the benefit with some great mischief. They saw that the Achaians were desirous, to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedemonians were very jealous. Wherefore these Achaians laboured earnestly, to set the Lacedemonians and Achaians together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called in to helpe (it skilled not on what side) and so get no small share, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their deuce vnto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that this Kingdome had sustained by the Achaians. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to giue the Lacedemonians cause to take Armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not altogether in his owne power to hold. He had bene meddling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedemon; and thereby had prouoked the Lacedemonians to looke about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians, their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaean.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subiect to the iniuries of any stronger Neighbor. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it; The Achaians entering Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand flaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxurie reigned among them, the poore was oppressed by the rich, and the generosity of spirit, that had sometime bene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta more then seven hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands: all the rest were needie people, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict obseruation of Lycurgus his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall diuision of Lands. All the yonger, and pooreer fort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counsaillors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne priuate commoditie. They were haffie to take away all debts, and cancell all bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: but the diuision of lands they afterwards hindered, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foule oppression of the pooreer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two aduersie Kings driuen to take a Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vsing their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and serued to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to aduoyne Lacedamon to the Achaean Common-wealth: though it were great iniustice to take such aduantages, and attempt by force, that which would haue redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could haue bene wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did also requite the iniust attempts of the Achaean, even in their owne kinde: obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedamonians and their King, should haue bene the principall, not they and their Prætor. Leonidas hauing thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in marriage (perforce) to his owne sonne Cleomenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as she had her person. He discouered much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertaine a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilst he was very yong, hee gladly embraced all occasions of Warre: for that hee hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt estate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedamonians; wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labor of a painful night's trauell, & discouered his enmity to Sparta, of which Cleomenes was nothing sorrie. By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discouered the Aetolian practice, & therefore would haue staid the quarrell from proceeding too farre. But Lyfias & Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so yrger. Aristomachus was at that time Generall of the Achaean, (He and Lyfias being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyrannie) who sent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a iourne to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would serue: therefore therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, little pleasing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Aristomachus, who desired to gaine battaile. Yet had the Achaean twentie thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than sixe thousand in all. This gaue reputation to the Lacedamonians, and raised an ill report vpon Aratus; which Lyfias helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardise. Neuertheless the *Achaean*s would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the yeere following, against Lyfias his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himselfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the slanderous words of Lyfias. Therefore hee purposed to set vpon the Eleus: but was met withall on the way, nere vnto the Mount Lyceus, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in great battaile, and draue him to hide himselfe all night for feare, so that hee was thought to haue bene slaine. This misaduenture Aratus recompenced by a tricke of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue bene expected, had hee bene victorious. For whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could vndertake; he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans had once before ioynted themselves with the *Achaean*s; but shortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gaue themselves to the *Aetolian*s; and from the *Aetolian*s, presently after this victorie, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus wonne. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achaean societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered nere vnto Megalopolis, wherethe *Achaean*s had some what the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his aduantage. Thereupon Lyfias, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedamonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too farre into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driuen backe vpon their owne Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Armie was disordered and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the *Achaean*s against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waied. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre nevertheless; wherin though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the *Achaean*s being wearie, and the Spartan King intente to another businesse.

Cleomenes hauing ledde into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull iournies, forsooke the Achaean warre on a sudden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where hee slue the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gaue hee an account of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched vpon the power of Kings, & many disorders had grown in the Citie, he iustified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall diuision of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. Hee also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Countrey might not altogether stand in need of Mercenarie helpe, as it hadie had done, to saue it selfe from the *Aetolian*s, Illyrians, and such other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied; and Cleomenes himselfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any aduantage of these his domestick troubles.

The *Achaean*s hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the Citie, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrey of Megalopolis; had ranged ouer all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantineia; and ready to take other places, euen of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, he proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedamonians resumed their ancient courage; and hee himselfe had the heart to demand the Principallitie of Greece. Hee did not therefore henceforth contend, about the possession of a few Townes: but aduentured to winne or lose all.

all The Aetolians, in fauour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side : and whereas he had gotten Mantineas, Tegae, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and saw that Antigonus with the Aetolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begonne. Therefore he deuised how to prouide against the worst, and eyther to repaire all, or (if it could not be) to saue all from vtter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, he refused; fearing to be so far prest, as to hazard in one battaile all the force of his Countrie, to which as he had neuer any affection, nor purchase courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For hee commonly attempted by surpris, & defended vpon the aduantage of place, after the manner of the Trifans, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did hee not forsake the care of the Weale-publique, though in aiming at the generall good, it seems that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantineas had noronlie opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but slaine the Achean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yielded vnto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since Generall of the Acheans, was now reuolted vnto the enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemy was too farre off to helpe; and the neerensse of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be vsfull, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemy, as should best agree with his owne profit. To maketriall hereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom hee found apt vnto his purpose; and instructed them how to deale both with Antigonus, and the Acheans.

The Citie of Megalopolis had bene well affected to the Macedonians, euer since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay neerest vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore desired succour; yet could not well be rescued by the Acheans, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lacke of what else to answer: and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecessors, of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to giue them aide. But when they deliuered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had giuen them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Aetolians, might redound to his owne great losse or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Acheans vnder the Patronage of Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentive eare to their discourse. Hee embraced the motion: and to giue it the more life, hee wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might hand with the Acheans good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers to Aratus, assuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions hee now perceived, not to haue bene grounded vpon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only vpon a iust and worthy loue to his owne Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis: and are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia, there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The Acheans were glad to hear, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire, and therefore were ready to entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his consent; and praised the wisdom of his Countreimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safetie: adding neuerthelesse, that it were not amisse, first of all to try their owne abilitie, which if it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he deuised himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustaine the common reprehension, if anything fell out amisse; since it might appeare, that hee had not bene Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leisurely, the generall consent.

Neuerthelesse

Neuerthelesse in true estimation, this finenesse of Aratus might haue bene vsed, with his greater commendation, in a contrarie course. For it had bene more honourable, to make an end of the War, by yeelding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: since thereby he should both haue freed his Countrie from all further trouble, and withall should haue restored vnto the vniuersall state of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pitty) that Vertue hauing risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the seat of Principalltie, by length of time, and successe of many actions; can ill endure the hastie growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it selfe likeli to be ouer-topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedemonians there was none; than that they lately had bene in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should preferre Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that hee had stood in doubt of the one, when hee thought himselfe more mighty, than the other. Wherefore hee was iustly plagued, when he saw his owne honors reuerfed by the insolent Macedonians; and instead of siuing as a companion with Cleomenes, that was defended of a long race of Kings, the posteritie of Hercules was faine to doe sacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a god, and was finally poysoned by Philip, whose Nobilitie was but of five descents, and whom perhaps hee might haue seene his fellowes, if hee had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolemy was lost: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though hee did not supply him with such liberalltie, as hee had vsed to the Acheans; being warned, as may seeme, by their example, to be more warie both in trulling and disburling. Cleomenes himselfe, whilest this businesse with Antigonus was a-foot, passed through Arcadia with an Armie, and laboured by all means to draw the Acheans to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, & there fought with them; where he had so great a victorie, that the enemy was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamitie was such, that Aratus himselfe durst not take vpon him to be their Generall, when his tume came in the next election. Wherefore the Acheans were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted vpon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate vnto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in warre. Hereunto if they would condescend, he promised vnto them, that hee would prescinde reuerall places taken from them, and all his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enioy their owne Lawes and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Acheans: who desired him to come to the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had euer bene since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warres, yea or since the Persian inuasion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindeed all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in great heat, and thereupon fell extreame sicke, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Neuerthelesse he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners to shew that he meant no other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Acheans in their desire of his friendship: who assembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and fought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countreimen afraid of resolving. When all would not serue turne, hee betooke himselfe to his cunning, and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should doe well to leaue his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hostages for safetie of his person. Cleomenes was alreadye farre on his way, when he met with this aduertisement: and tooke it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had bene an easie matter, to haue told him so much at the first, and not haue made him come so far with an Armie, which afterwards hee must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seemed to haue troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who sought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale onely with themselves and their Messengers; or if hee would aduenture himselfe into the Citie, then to depriue him of all Royall shew, that might breed respect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he sought to hinder his coming thither in person: lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, and finish the bargain without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these juggling trickes: and Aratus vnto not farre behind with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betwene feare of the one, and reverence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake vpleasing all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his aduantage of their present weakness, and renewed the Warre. Many Cities yeelded vnto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force; partly by terror, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieue the distressed Achaens. Antigonus gaue good words as could be wished: saying that hee vnterly refused to doe any thing, vnlesse hee might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was some what like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horse against his enemy the Stagge: but with condition, that the horse should suffer himselfe to be saddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deferred, to be thus giuen away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himselfe out of their Cite, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus by surrounding it within Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leave. Whilst this was doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the Barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians; to Peloponnesus; promising that if he would hearken to these persuasions, then would hee giue him double the same pension, which he had been wont to receiue of King Ptoleme. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soueraigntie of the Countrey; hee desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be jointly kept by the Lacedemonians and Achaens. All this entreaty serued to no purpose. For Aratus, rejecting vnterly the motion, sent his owne sonne as an Hostager to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achaens, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes vnderstood, he seized vpon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, whereof this his Aduersary was native.

Antigonus in the meane time drew nere to the Isthmus; hauing passed with his Army through Euboea, because the Ætolians held the streights of Thermopyla against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this iourney. At his comming thither he found the Lacedemonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard bataille, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which hee came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able to doe: hee secretly got into the Corinthian Hauens; but was violently driuen out againe, with great losse of men; finally he resolved to turne aside, and seeke a passage over the gulfes of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no lesse troubled his enemies. The Achaens were gotten into that Cite; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driuen out of the Citadell, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present helpe. Argos had alwayes beene to enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooke it, he forbore to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of offenders; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that hee would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But what which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would haue been tyrannicall, hee did it not. Thereupon, such such as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, began to turne good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Achaens; assailed his Garrisons; cut in peeces the Reliefe that he sent; and compelled him at length, to forsake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behind his backe. For when he vnderstood by continuall messages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost lost: hee began to feare, lest his labour in guarding the entry, should grow fruitlesse; the Achaens in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore hee forooke his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if hee could saue, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so farre he preuailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argues and Achaens were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the Citie; when the horsemen of Antigonus were discovered a farre off; hastning to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yeelded, as soone as the Spartans had turned his backe) following apace with the bodie of his Armie. Cleomenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a safe retreat. This hee did; and got him home into Laconia: losing in short space all, or most of that which hee had beene long in getting.

Antigonus hauing shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Aradus; where hee wane such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, hee tooke his way to Aegium, where was held a Parliament by the Achaens; to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake braue words, that filled them with hope. The Achaens were not behinde with him; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entered into covenant with him, That they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassage, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was come on) where hee not onely sealed him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if in stead of Cleomenes that would haue beene a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burden vpon the Achaens. This was hardly taken; yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which hee had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which hee had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one onely left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreatie. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spitefull. Neuerthelesse in taking reuenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his own passion by the ayde of these Macedonians. For with extreame torments hee did put Aristomachus to death, who had beene once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achaens; and from them reuoluing vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Manians for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Achaens. For hee slue all the principall Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bond-slaves: diuiding the spoyle, two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The Towne it selfe was giuen by Antigonus to the Argues: who peopled it with a Colony of their owne; and Aratus hauing charge of this businesse, caused it to bee new-named Antigenia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuse, than euen the flattery, which Aratus was driuen to vnto Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of frailty, whereinto they had yrred and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite. But leauing to speake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill state of the Achaens; Let vs returne into his warre-against the Lacedemonians.

The next Summer Antigonus wane Teges, Manina, Orchomenus, Heræa, and Telphassa; Manina hee dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus hee placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achaens: with whom hee wintered at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once onely Cleomenes had met him this yeare, & that was on the borders of Laconia, where hee lay ready to defend his owne Territorie. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Nauplia and to those other Townes that he wanne, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolemie the Egyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, unless he might haue Cleomenes his owne Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Egypte, yet the aide came not. For Ptolemie was slow; as dealing in the business of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of aeternitie. Cleomenes therefore provided for himselfe, as well as his owne abilitie would serue. He manumitted all the Heilistes, which were the Lacedaemonian slaves; taking money for their libertie, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as hauing defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus no nearer hand. The Towne he wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beate Armes, rose hostilie against him; and though they could not driue him out, yet saued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Towne and goods to them againe; if they would be of his partie. But they brauely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it; carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes astonished the Achaean Antigonus, who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore hee returned them backe to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos; to receiue the rest of his vnlucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the greene Achaean. When hee had laine a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates; with no greater number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Achaean perceiving that their Countrey would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field, were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But he was wisest then to behead with their clamors, and suffered them to see their villages burnt, to bid him resigne his Office of Protector vnto some that were more valiant; and to scisise their passions with foolish words; rather than hee would bee overcome in fight, and thereby lose more honor than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire in weakening the reputation of his enemy: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength vnto Lacedaemon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troops; meaning to requite the brauado's of his enemy, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the warre from his owne gates; and therefore entred vpon the Countrey of Argos; where he made such hauocke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonians was faine to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Countrey of the Argives, Phlians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligyria; and did sacrifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Iuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorn, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yet serued to dishearten the Achaean side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore hee concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by setting vp his reit, without any more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. Hee had in his Armie eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gauls, Epirots, Bowthians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achaean, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, with which hee lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus coming vnto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, vpon and betwene the hills of Eua and Olympus; that hee was constrained to spend much time there, before hee could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which hee greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Armie, in assaying their well-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings beinge resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians; to force that part which lay on the hill Eua. But his Illyrians were so ill reconded by the Achaean foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foot, incamped in the streight vallie betwene those hills, issuing forth, fell vpon their skins, and not onlie disordered them, but were like to haue endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Euclidas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground afforded, whenon he lay. Philopamen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proued a famous Capitaine, serued then on horse, as a private yong man, among the Achaean. He seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driuen to fall backe vpon the Armie following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achaean horse, to brake vpon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had giuen order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they receiued a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiving them to be more orderly, then wel aduised, entreated some of his own Countreimen to follow him; gaue a charge on the Spartans; and forced them, not only to leaue the Illyrians, but seek how to saue themselves. Being so farre aduanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be wonne, through the skilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore hee alighted, and perswaded the men at Armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Euclidas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon euene terms. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was sore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedaemonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Euclidas, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himselfe, was like to haue bene furrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an extraordinary speed. In this battaile ended the glory of Lacedaemon, which, as a light readie to goe out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, then in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no desire to stay, finding onely two hundred left, of sixte thousand Spartans that he had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lye in his owne power, for their good, he hastied away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) & imbarqued himselfe for Egypte. He was louingly embraced by Ptolemie Evergetes; who vnderooke to restore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour and qualities. In the meane season hee had a pension allowed him, of foure and twentie Talens, yearly. But this Ptolemie died; and his sonne Ptolemie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindfull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him; Ptolemie and his Minions, would neither giue him aide; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because hee was too well acquainted with the weakenesse of Egypte: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirtie of his Countreimen, hee vnderooke a desperate enterprise: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrines to rebell and seeke their libertie. In which attempt hee slue some enemies of his that hee met; and hauing walked vp and downe the streets without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalf) hee, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead body Ptolemie was bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had bene fient thither as Hostages, together with the wiues of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudie ende, as now befall his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grand-children.

After the victorie at Selasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: wherein to neuer the force of anie Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly entreated the the Citizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Government: tarrying there no longer than two or three daies; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an aduertisement that he received out of Macedon; how the Illyrians ouer-ran, and destroyed the Countrey. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few daies longer, or least-wife tarried a few daies after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedaemon would haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battaile with the Illyrians, and ouer-came them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-straying his voyce; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus sumamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemy Philopater, beganne to reigne in Asia, and Egypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolemy, though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuentene yeeres of his reigne. The wastage of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is visible in the minority of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speak of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

Whilest things thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spain: the Romans had found themselves worke among the Sardinians and Corficans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made also warre with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little paine. With the Gauls they had much adoe, that lasted not long; being rather, as Linie saith, a tumult than a warre. So that by all these light exercises, their valour was little kept from rust. How they got the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea; it hath bin shewed before: of their dealings with Illyrians and Gauls, it is not meete to be vterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slauonia: a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaine, without either regard of friend or foe. They were inuited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to helpe the Mydians, his friends, that were besieged by the Aetolians; for that they refused to be of their societie. Before the Illyrian succours came, the Mydians were so farre spent, that the Aetolians contended about the booty: the old Praetor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honour of the victory, and the diuision of the spoyle to be referred vnto him; for that hee had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and wonne the Towne: others, that were in hope to bee chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that olde orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had wonne the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Aetolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus: That the olde, and the new Praetor, should be ioynly intitled in the victorie, and haue equal authority in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Aetolians; & though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the helpe of the Mydians, that were not idle in their owne busines, but stoutly sallied out of the Town. Many of the Aetolians were slain, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians tooke the spoyle, and went their way; the Mydians erected a Trophee, inscribing the names, both of their olde and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Aetolians had directed them by example.

regard of the mony, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not vn-calle to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For ioy of this he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that hee fell into a Fleuriſſe, which in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Touta, his wife.

Touta gaue her people free liberty, to rob all sorts at Sea, making no difference betweene friend and foe; as if theee had bene sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. She armed a fleet, and sent it into Greece: willing her Captaines, to make warre where they found aduantage, without any further respect. These fell with the westerne coast of Peloponnesus; where they inuaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed at the Citie of Phenice, to take in victualles and other necessities. There lay in Phenice eight hundred Gauls; that hauing bene Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agismentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they neuerthelesse reuolted, and were for their misdeedes disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Towne. The Gauls were soone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phenice; which deserued none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in armes, and hastned to driue out these vnwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Scerdilaidas, whom Queene Touta had sent to helpe his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Towne, and the streights adioyning, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrey; another part of them remains at Phenice, to continue the siege. Neither the one, nor the other, sped well in their businesse. For Scerdilaidas found meanes to ioyne with his fellowes; and they that were besieged within Phenice, sallied out of the towne, and gaue such an ouerthrow to the Epirots, as made them despaire of sauing their Countrey, without great and speedy helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embassadours were sent to the Achaens and Aetolians: craving their helpe, with very pittifull tearmes of entreatie. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Armie, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home, by letters from Touta the Queene, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered composition, which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransom their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their bootie and slaues. Hauing made this profitable and honourable bargain; the Illyrians returned into their owne Countrey by Land, sending their bootie away by Sea. At their coming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilest they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Touta, that she should abstaine from doing such iniuries. These Embassadours found her very iolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that shee had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, saue onely the towne Issa, which her forces held feightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, shee could hardly afford a good looke to the Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyrracy, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, shee vouchsafed to tell them, That iniury in publike thee would doe them none: as for priuate matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subiects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (said the yonger of the two Embassadours) wee Romans haue a manner, and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of those priuate wrongs that are borne out by publike authority: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine: as if that had bene the way, to set her heart at rest; which was indeed the meane, to disquiet and afflict it euer after.

The

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred saile, commanded by C. Fulvius, the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this inhumane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadors: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to be this; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of warre and destruction, therefore it was equally receiued by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadors should passe freely, and in safetie, betwene enemies. Neuerthelesse, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State, lay hold vpon Embassadors sent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell, then it is as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadors (thus employed, to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, and subiects, of an enemy. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slew the Lacedamonian Embassadors, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadors, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countreies they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoever. For whereas the true Office of an Embassador residing, is the maintenance of amitie, if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassador doe it without incurring iustly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Civilians; and goe on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassador Coruncanus.

The Illyrian Queene was (scare of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was in leede in an error; that hath vndone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than she, both before and since: Having more regard vnto fame, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Aetolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had the easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than often thousand men; and that neuerthelesse, it preuailed as much, by odds of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; she would haue continued to vie her advantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not haue needed to oppose her lare-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe, and one part of it fell with Dyrrachium, the other with Coreyra. Dyrrachium was almost surpris'd by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In Coreyra the Illyrians landed, wasted the isle, and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Aetolians and Achaens were called in to helpe: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of lesse note, Marcus Caryneis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Towne of Coreyra, dismaied with this ouerthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Tenta was angry with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were euen ready to put to Sea, though vncertaine which way to take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Confull, of Demetrius his feare and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the business in hand. Wherefore the Confull sailed thither; where he found the Towne of Coreyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only receiued him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Confull sailed along the coast, to Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vsed thenceforth as his counsailler and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Confull, with the Land-Armie, numbered at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they disperse themselves.

From

a Dyrrachium, sometime called Epidamnus, and now Durazzo, (situated vpon the Adriatick Sea, betwene the Islands of Pharus & Coreyra, an Illand of the Adriatick Sea, not farre from Durazzo; called now Corfu, and in the partition of the Pontians).

c Apollonia, a Citie neere Dyrrachium, in Durazzo, vpon the Sea-coast. Pompeius calls it Argenteum.

Prohibited the Romans to take Pharus, and take Pharus, beat the Illyrians by Sea; take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queene Tenta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Epiron, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leaue the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part stays behinde, and proceeseth the war, in such sort, that Tenta was forced to beseege, which the vntail and vpon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; andauerthenceforth, neuer send any of her ships of war, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Land of Epiron: except it were some one or two vessels, warranted, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans sent Embassadors into diuers parts of Greece, signifying their loue to the Countreies, and how, for good will therunto, they had made warre with good successe vpon Tenta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Citiees would take this occasion, to rescue their patriotes; which if it hapned, they were wile enough to play their owne games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadors were onely rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth; That the Romans thenceforth might be protectors of the Illyrian patriotes. This was an idle courtie, but well meant by the voice Greeks, and therefore well taken by the Romans; who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance; that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the warre betwene the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italie.

The Gauls that dwelt in Lombardie, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome, sometimes with their owne forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that warre proved not answerable to the beginning; if we may giue credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many ouerthrowes they receiued; and if they got any victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduised: lightly stirred vp to warre, and lightly giuing order. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwayes carefull heede to their approach, were it onely bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumultuous Gallick, tumults of the Gauls; and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vsed to rise with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion serued to disperse them. Having receiued an ouerthrow; they would rest ten or twelue yeeres, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred vp againe, by yonger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested, the state of Rome, that against them made onely defensive warre, had leisure to grow; by setting vpon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchie, which he intended to raise: that the Gauls neuer fell vpon Italie, with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Dyrrachium was troubling in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punicke warres: it may be doubted what would haue become of this imperious Citie. But it seemeth that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to vse their times: and were therefore like to smarr, wheneuer the enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, should find leisure to visit them at their owne home: which was now after the first Punicke Warre. Once before this, the Romans had bene bold, to set vpon the Gauls in their own Countreies; and that was three yeeres before the coming of Pyrrius into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Belgium, and besieging Arretium, had won a great battaile, and slaine L. Caninius with the most of his Armie. Mannius Curius the new Confull, sent Embassadors to them, to treat about ransom of prisoners. But these

Embassa-

Embassadors they sue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Countie, and sent a Colonie of their owne to inhabit it. This caused the Boij, another people of Gauls, to seize the like measure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Helvetians to their side. But the Romans purshew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted vntill this end of the Illyrian warre.

e There were diuers nations of the Boij; as in Commanis, Lyres, Germanie, in Bourbon, in France, and in Aquaine; but these Boij were of the Franks, and dwelt at this time about the mouth of the Ritter of Pe.

It vexed the Gauls, to see a Roman Colonie planted in their Countie, who had bene accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by diuining out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpins (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they were neerer, like as they called Cisalpins, or by higher the Alpes, those who dwell between them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their disunion had caused their losse, so their vniou might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpins and Transalpins, fell together by the eares, putting the Romans openly to a sumult, without further trouble of warre. Soone after, they were vrged by a greater indignitie, to go more substantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, propounded a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colonie already planted in the territorie of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would serue to people the whole Countie betweene Ancona and Ariminum; exterminating vtterly those Gauls. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it selfe, would not ouer-joy the Multitude. But the Common-ty of Rome, took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger ioyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had euer after their good will.

This dreadful President extremely displeased the Boij: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displacement. And because the Boij of the Gauls had reason to resolve, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, ioyned with the Boij, and vpon a common purpose entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wasgable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates having received a great Imprest, come to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Concolianus and Anerostus: who with the Boij and Insubrians, compassed an Armie of fiftie thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer invaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Senogalli, that had bene beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better believing in their prosperitie and rising fortune. For feare of whole incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leave a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: with the rest of their forces they entered into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, send Amilius to Rimini, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Consull, who then was in Sardinia, they employ one of their Praetors, for the defence of Tuscane.

f Cenomanni, are the people about Bergama, on the North side of the River Pe in Italie. There were also of these Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Countie of Alain.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the consideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gauls had assembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all thir owne forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserue to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consulls they sent forth to the warre foure Legions of their owne: euerie Legion consisting of fise thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two hundred horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any misaduenture came to these) of the Salines and Helvetians fiftie thousand foot, and four thousand horse; which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Helvetia. Of the Vmbri and Sarfinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twenty thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomanni, other twenty thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to invade the Boij, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the generall Armie of the Gauls should be thereby diminished. There were besides these, to be ready against all vn certaine changes of war, thirtie thousand foot, and fiftene hundred horse, garrisoned in Rome it selfe, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Our and about these great troupes; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent vnto the Senate, there were numbered foure score thousand foot, and fise thousand horse; in that of the Samites, seecente thousand foot, and of horse seuen thousand, in that of the Lepages, and Messages, fiftie thousand foot, and sixerene thousand horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Marfi, Marrucini, Terentini, and the Velitini, of twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicill, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand foure hundred foot, and four hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campani ioynly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were registred two hundred and fiftie thousand foot; and of horse three and twentie thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and about sixe thousand horse. Casting vp the whole forces of all the Prouinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to seuen hundred thousand foot, and seuecie thousand horse. But the number is somewhat misse-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himselfe by the dead paies: for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, he fals short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.

How great focuser this Muster was, it seemes to haue bene like vnto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lepus the twelfth invaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himselfe, and his subiects, he tooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes, within the Dutchie, though indeede he were neuer able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Trasymen, and Canna, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their slaues, euen for want of other Souldiers, after their ouerthrow at Canna. Wherefore the maruaille is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helms: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gauls keepe on their way: and coming into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the Roman Armie, sent into Tuscane, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had misfed of them, came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their iourne. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: and in the same turning discouered the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessitie, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratageme: that shewed no great fincenne of wit, but such, as well becomed those that had none other occupation than warre; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not farre: leaving their horse in guard; to whom they giue order, to come off at the first light of day, with such speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retreat, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their haile departure, as the Gauls desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gauls returne; charge them, and kill sixe thousand vpon the place; the rest take a peece of ground of aduantage, and defend themselves, till L. Amilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Vpon the coming of the Consull, the Gauls confult, whether they should giue the Romans battaile, or forbear. In which dispute, Anerostus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to returne into their owne Countie; where, after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carriage, pester, or other impediment. This aduice they all embrace; for being they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoiles of their enemies, they thought it wisdome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves, any further.

This indeede had bene a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had bene in sight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer bene found extreme dangerous, to make a retreat in the Head of an enemies Armie. For although they that retire, doe often turne head, yet in alwayes going on from the pursuing enemy, they finde within a few miles, either streight, hedge, ditch, or place of aduantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knows g Latyes; and Messages seeme to be one Nation; who are also called Salmates, Procerani, Apuliani, & Calabrians. The Countie is now Apulia, containing the Northernmost head-land of Calabria. h A people of the kingdom of Naples. i Ptoleme calls them a people of Italie. k A people of Campanie, called to this day Terentines, faith Leander.

knowes it, as well as the Capitaine, that he which forsakes the field, perceives, and teares some advantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the berraiet of those succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possessed the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and vnderstanding. They that make the retreat, are alwayes in feare to be abandoned; they that lead the way, feare to be engaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, and perish, if those that favour the retreat, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow, that the French received in Naples, in the yeere 1503. vpon a retreat made by the Marques of Salodoch, testifie no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse, sustained the pursuing enemy a long time, and gave the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot over-tooke, and defeated them utterly. During the wars between to the Imperials, & the French, Boiss and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a brauery would needes see the enemy, before they left the field. So was Strossi overthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersley, by night; as many other, the most aduised Capitaines, (not finding themselves in case to giue battail) haue done. Le ne trouue point (saith the Marshall Monluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retraite; I finde nothing in the art of warre so difficult, as to make a safe retreat. A sure rule it is, that there is lesse dishonour to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hercof M. de la Noue giues this iudgement, of a dayes retreat, made in France, presently before the battail of Moncontour. For (saith he) staying vpon our reputation, in shew, not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disadvantage, and to our ruine. And yett did that worthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncontour with so great resolution, as he saved the one halfe of the Protestant Armie, then broken and disbanded, of which my selfe was an eye-witnesse, and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turne their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Æmilus follows them, as neere as he can, without ingaging himselfe, attending his advantage. In the meane while, C. Atilius the other Consul, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Psas, so as the Gauls, inclosed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Reare, and Front. To sustaine Æmilus, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanois; in the Front, they range the Piemontis, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting vpon the Riuers of Po. The manner of the fight Polibius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls felt; and so did Atilius the Consul: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Concolitanus and Anercesius, with fortie thousand of their Vassils.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were invaded the yeere following this overthrow, by the new Consuls, Fulsius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vse their victory: they gate not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeeres time, to the Gauls, to repaire their forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boij; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second yeere, Furius, and Flaminius, invade the Milanois; and preuaile very farre, being strongly assisted by the Senonians and the Venetians. Neuertheless these Consuls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resigne their Office: because the Augures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their diuination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not onely foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiving letters of this reuocation, from the Senate, and being otherwise aduerted of the contents, was not hasty to open them: but first gaue battail vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Countrey; then perused the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, for against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yett bare him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonaltie, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for diuiding the Countrey of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that vnderstanding the Maiestie of Rome to be indeede wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegation, or grand Commission; did not stand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vse their power, ouer himselfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the fier side, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, which in proceesse of time, grew the onely or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed; M. Caudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that yeere. The Gauls about this time desired peace, and were like to haue obtained it: though the new Consuls were against it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirtie thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, and ioyned with the Insubrians: all other discourse, of present warre, was at an end. So the Consuls halted into their Prouince, where they besieged Acerra, a towne not farre from Nouaro (so far had the Romans pierced already in the Duchie of Milan). To diuert them from this siege, Britomarus sent downe before Clusidum, a Towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend vpon the Consuls at Acerra, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans breake vp their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and fixe hundred foot lightly armed; thought to deale well enough with those at Clusidum. Britomarus heard of the Consuls coming, and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their iournie, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauery, lost his game at a cast. Hee had aduantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his owne personal valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, proouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no lesse daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, & that sufficed to commend him. Hee lue and disarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men took such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great victory.

This was the third and last time, that euer any Roman General slue the General of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof onely Romulus, Cossus, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipios, and diuers other Roman Capitaines, especially Cæsar, were better men of wane than any of these three; though they neuer offered vp to Insipit, Opimus, Polio; The Amour of a General slain by themselves, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected so to doe.

After this victory, Acerra was yielded to the Romans; and Milan soone after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpinis, or Gauls, that dwell in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many yeeres vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citie it selfe, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territories possessed by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italie, so many as would not submit their neckes to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countreys, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-lawes and Thieves. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeeres, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed vp the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before, (it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre) saue once, in the reigne of Numa, nor in long time after, vntill the reigne of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long: a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer beene, was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly vndertake, to extend their Monarchie as far, as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.

Of the second Punick Warre.

§. I.

The warres of Hannibal in Spain. Quarrels betwene the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besieged and taketh Saguntum, whilst the Romans are busied with the Ithyrians. warre proclaimed betwene Rome and Carthage.

Hannibal, the sonne of Amilcar, was about fixe and twentie yeeres old, when he was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was elected by the Armie, as soon as Adrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barcas) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps haue bene lesse enuied, by these domestical enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in government, and bene the onely men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy defense of Amilcar, in saving his Countrey from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treasures and great reuenues; so was it retained by the same good arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to take the vertue of their enemies, that was very probable; nor to performe the like triuies vnto the Common-weale, had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprobation of Warre, and enuious aduice of not prouoking the Romans. This they season'd oth'rwisles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction were about to oppress the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious words were vregarded; and if were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no securitie to Carthage, were the neuer so quiet, and officious; yndle the would yeeld to become their Subjects. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than vntill the Romans could finde some good advantage, to renew the Warre: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their owne state was in good case, the warre should begin; than that in some unhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driven to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to giue away busily their lands and treasures, as they had lately done, or miserably fight, vpon termes of disadvantage.

This disposition of his Countrymen, Hannibal well vnderstood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuised of this business) that in making war with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italie, without much lestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and assistance, euen of those people, that helped to increate the Roman Armies in foreigne wars. But this could neuer be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soeuer they would be, to heare that he had set the war on foot, would neuertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discouered, in procuring allowance to his designe. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege vnto Saguntum, which might seeme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in minde the indignitie of that Spanish Townes alliance with their halfe friends. So should he assaile both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Having

Having thus concluded, he neuertheless went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approaching vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Lince) to giue some colour to his proceedings: as if hee had not principally intended the warre against Saguntum, but had bene drawne thither by course of business. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needefull to finish the conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should prouoke the Romans. First therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the Oleades; and hauing besieged Althaa (Lince calleth it Cartia) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Master not onely thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countrey. This Nation which he first vnderooke, being subdued, and the winter at hand; he rested his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in his late conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the warre against the Vaccai: and without any great difficulty, wan first Salamanica, now called Salamanka; and after it, Arbucala, by assault: though not without a long siege, and great difficulty. But in his returne, he was part to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all such of the Vaccaes as were able to beare armes, being made desperate by the spoile of their Countrey, with those of Salamanka, and of the Oleades, that had fled in the late ouerthrow, joining themselves with the Toletans; compounded an Armie of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbonne in Portugale. These four Nations, hauing had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he neuer saw enemy, vpon whom he durst not giue charge; were thoroughly refoised, that his naturall valour would at this time no lesse neglect the cold aduice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to vse it. But he that makes himselfe a body of Cry stall, that all men may look through him, and discern all the parts of his disposition; makes himselfe (withall) an Asse: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drine him. Wise men, though they haue single hearts in all that is iust and venturous; yet they are like Coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtle Carthaginian, when he seru'd vnder Adrubal, was, of all the men of mark in the Armie, the most aduenturous. But that which may be seeme a Captaine, or inferior Commander, doth not alwayes become a Cheefe; though it hath sometime succeeded well with such great ones, as haue bene found more fortunate, than wise. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to dissemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For hee with-drew himselfe from the River-side, as if fearefull to land it; thereby to draw ouer that great multitude, from their banks of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired that they should; thrust themselves in furie and disorder, into the swift streame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defense on the contrarie side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well nere ouer; he turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing: and thrust his Horse-men, both aboue and beneath them, into the River. These carrying a kinde of Lance de gey, sharpe at both ends, which they held in the midst of the flut; had such an aduantage ouer the foot, that were in the River, vnder their strokes, danc'd together, and vnable to move or shift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they slew all those, (in a manner) without resistance, which were already entred into the water; and pursued the rest, that fled like men amazed, with so great a slaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that side the River of Iberus (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift vp their hands against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiving the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They sent Embassidours to Rome, and bemoaned themselves, as likely to suffer that, which afterwards they suffered indeede; onely because of their alliance and friendship with this honourable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate; but much more a report, that Saguntum was already besieged. Hereupon some cry out, that Warre should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africke. But others went more Roman-like to worke, and carried it. So it was onely concluded; that Embassadours should be sent into Spain, to view the state of their Confederates: which were indeed none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would giue them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they listed themselves, vpon the report of these Embassadours; and this their grauitie, in being not too rash at first, would serue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours Lisius reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of sinceritie lesse questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthage, & had conference with him, though such as left them doubtful. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Lisius confesseth) and fall to disputation about the couenants of peace; if they had reiected that which was sent vpon none other pretence, than preuention of warre.

A people (saith Stephanus) were the River of Ebro. But in the old description of Spain, in Ortelius, they are found nere Tagus, and by Suidas, not far from New Carthage. A people of the old Arbucala, or Albuclia, an inland Citie of the Vaccaei in Aragon.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamerines, or people that should doe as the Mamerines in Sicily had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani, a Nation adioyning to Saguntum, and hauing many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbors) of which, Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoever it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more adoe, but sat downe with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more secure, than he had formerly bene, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reuerence, as of late yeeres they had bene wont. Neuertheless, he was glad of any hand some colour, to shadow his actions, not onely because the warre, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary d-fire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hastie to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readinesse to be sent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seat of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King ouer a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himselfe ouer-sightly tyed vp by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an vnthankfull disposition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to haue defended and aided, in all perils, even with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had recieued of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Isles of Greece, against the couenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further and seized vpon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed somewhat longer, he might haue speeded better. For the businesse with the Gauls, was ended, with Hannibal not thoroughly begun: when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Emilius, was sent against him: who in seuen dayes won the strong Towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terror vpon the Countrey round about, that Embassadours were sent from all places, to yelde themselves, without putting him to further paines. Onely the Citie of pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which he might haue done long, if the hot-headed Rebelle had not bene too foolish. Emilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of pharus, by night; and bestowed them in couert, presenting himselfe the next morning, with twenty ships before the Towne, & offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consul, & was soone intercluded from the Town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creeke, where he had shipping ready ready for him, and embarked himselfe: leaving all his estate vnto them, of whose liberality he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum, before which Hannibal sat downe, ere Emilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall receiued a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many dayes vnable to moue. Neuertheless, he was not vnmindefull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raise certaine mouable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the wals of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtains, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of durtis Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not onely beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which vpon the first furie they had won, but they were pursued euen to their owne trenches and campe. Neuertheless the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did sweare the Townesmen with continuall traualle, that at length it got within the wals; and was onely hindered from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-workes of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon Saguntine, that conueyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuer, and without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countymen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold siluer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that hee would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselves, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they haue better haue submitted themselves vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might haue enioyed their liues, and saved the honour of their wiues and daughters) than to haue rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did: by whom their wiues and daughters were defouled before their own faces; and all put to sword, that were aboue fouretee yeeres of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the deere rate, they shut themselves vp like most wretched creatures in their owne houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying vnreueged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the slaues, and other bootie, he diuided among his Souldiers; reseruing some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to be angry at their owne slownesse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, but in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadours against Carthage: demanding onely, whether it were by general consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre vpon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to giue them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect. That this their second Embassage, howsoever qualified with milde words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they onely required iustice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was vrged to plead guiltie, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian Secretary) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, haue onely followed his owne counsaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeede worthy examination or dispute, is; Whether it were lawfull or unlawfull, for Hannibal to doe as he hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errors; to you, to challenge vs, if we haue done any thing contrary to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Læti the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, betwene you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that haue taught vs, how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treatie betwene vs and Lulzimus, to your owne disadvantage, you cast it vpon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the same liberty may we also assume, and hold our selues no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere cauill. For Lulzimus the Consul, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had beene therefore much better, to haue dealt plainly; and to haue alleaged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents: which periurie the State of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open warre. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith inscribed their names into the Treatie of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treatie with Asdrubal, and all other businesse betwene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman iniuries, as implying this commination, Do what you please, we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which we haue already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not allege, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Linus himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards, had long beene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinary force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embassadors, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Scipio gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gowne-skirt both Peace & War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Euen which of them you your selfe haue a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make warre, it was merely frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer beene maintained by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. Therewith sword, and the empty purse, doe alwayes pleade performance of covenants. There haue beene few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwise vnderstood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne aduantage: and commonly (seeing peace betwene ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing the best) aduised haue rather begun with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henry the second of France, with the Imperiall, when he wrote to Brissac, so surpriue as many places as he could, ere the war brake out; Don John, with the Netherlands, and Philip the second of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbargo he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of iniuries receiued from these enemies, had another priuate and hereditarie desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time hee did sacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spaine, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortal hatred, and to worke them all possible mischief, as soone as he

he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no maruell, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, haue receiued the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spaine, and Africke. His journey into Italy.

After being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved, not to put vp his sword, which he had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill he had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke warre; second to none, that euer the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthage, where he licenced his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the government of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troopes of Spaniards into Africke, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africke thirteene thousand, eight hundred and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Baleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, all yong men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garriison in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their seuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies; whereof thirty seuen were presendie armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans and other Nations strangers, he left with him about twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africke; he sent Discoverers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Alpes. Hee also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtain a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors and discoverers being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, hee past ouer the Riuer of Iberus, with an Armie consisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his house, who late still at Carthage) to gouerne Spaine on the East side of the River; to whom he left an Armie of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also doe, or attempt, hee courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Heereby it came to passe, that the iourneie seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, hee past the Pyrenes, and entred into Gaul. Hee found the Gauls that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrey: but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, hee came to the bank of Rhodonius; where dwell, on each side of the Riuer, a people called Volca. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing ouer the water. But hee was greatly assisted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodonius, to wit, by those of Vinaret; and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods; into the Countrey of Daulphine, phine, thinking to defend the further banke against him : yet such as remained, being very desirous to free their Countie of so many ill guests, were better pleased to haue their Countie-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to haue their owne store of corne and cattell wasted, by the long stay of so great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the Riuer : and lent him guides. When the Velsels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse; hee sent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilcar, vp the Riuer : himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour was : that Hanno charging the Gauls vniuares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuer in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in conueying ouer his Elephants; who maruellouslie feared the water. He was therefore driuen to make rasses of trees, and couer them with earth and Turfe; whereof hee fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose, vpon which the beasts were towed ouer.

Having past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the Riuer, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gauls Cisalpine, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himselfe extremely incumbered by the Sauoians: and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly hee would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainelie assailed by them, before he could recover the plaine Countie on the other side. And whereas this iourne ouer the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes trouble, hee was every day, more or lesse, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall extremely beaten with grievous weather and snow: it being the beginning of Winter, when hee began, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plainnes, which were now ready to receive them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gauls, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort and encouragement to go on: hauing nothing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Roman Armies, and resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vaine solicited the Spaniards and Gauls to take their part. The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gauls against the Romans.

THE Countries of Spain and Gaul, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spain in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to disswade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spain; from whom, in open assembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answer: With what face (saith he) can ye Romans perswade vs to value your Alliance, or to preserve it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Sagunines, to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, haue beene vterly routed out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else haue held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as wee, and other the people of Spain haue found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answer for the rest of our Countymen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnes at our hands; who are resolute, neuer to make account of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadors tooke their way towards the Gauls; vying their best arguments to perswade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italy, through their Territorie: and withall greatly glorifying themselves, thems, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gauls laughd them to scorne, and had hardly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall wee (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibals passage into Italy, entertaine a war which is not meant to be made against vs: Shall wee hold the warre among our selues, and in our owne Territorie, by force, which marcheth with a speedy pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies: Haue the Romans deferred so well of vs, and the Carthaginians so ill, that wee should set fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning? No, wee know it well, that the Romans haue already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

With this vnpleasing answer the Embassadors returned home: carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Majilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gauls were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gauls gaue hastie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boj, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies; at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemes that they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countie) to flee to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gauls, hauing little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed wearie, & seemed desirous to haue peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their will. For the Romans sent out Embassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Mantius the Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the reliefe of the besieged. But the Gauls, hauing laid a strong ambush in a woodioyning to the way, fell vpon the Prætor so opportunely, as he was vterlye ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recovered, by fast running, a little village, but defensible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Attius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent, to relieue the besieged, with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman associates: which forces were taken out of the Consuls Armie, and supplied by a new leue.

As the Gauls were too rash and hastie: so were the Romans too slow, and indeede too ill-advised, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perswaded, that Carthage, which had almost feruently endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace, would be so braue and courageous on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italy it selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spain, the other: in Spain: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Africa, with an hundred an 60. Quinqueremes, or Gallies, of five to an Oare, which preparation may seeme to threaten euen the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come nere. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consull, made all possible haste, by the way of Gomazino Prouence, and vsed such diligence, hauing the winde also fauourable, as in five dayes he recovered Majilia. There he was aduertised, of Hannibal his hauing passed the Riuer of Rhodanus, whom he thought to haue found busie yet a while in Spain. Hannibal had also newes of the Consuls arrival: whereof he was neither glad, nor sorry, as not meaning to haue to doe with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts, to discouer the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, hauing slaine onely two hundred, and lost of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew nere, to haue met with the Carthaginians; hee found, that they were gone three daies before; and that (as he then found assuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome.

This

This interrupted his intended voyage into Spain. Neuertheless hee sent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Army, to trie what might be done against Asdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisa; and so passing through Tuscane into Lombardie, drew together the broken troops of Manlius & Attilus, that lately had bin beaten by the Gauls: with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to finde him over-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull iourne.

§. IIII.

Scipio the Romane Consull ouer-come by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Romane Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battaile at Trebia.

INue moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious iourne from Carthage; what great murther he could make, when he had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, & his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to haue beene onely twenty thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, agreeeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gauls, Ligurians, and others that ioined with him, are likely to haue mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which all saue those remembered by himselfe in the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue perished, by diseases, enemies, Riuers, and Mountains, which multitudes had deuoured, each, their severall shires.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countie of Piemonte; he fought to winnethe friendship of the Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore he assaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three daies. Their spoile serued well to harren his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gauls, without more ado, fell vnto his side: many for feare, many also for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countie: which ioined, or was all in a readinesse to ioine with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consull his arriuall, made some to be more aduised, than the rest. The name of the Romanes was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consull was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had beene heard of his approach: many farre still for very feare, who else would faine haue concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their seruice against the Carthaginians, whom neuertheless they had wished well to speed.

This wavering affection of the Prouince, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals hasten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of the wondered at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange that the Consull whom hee had left behinde him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himselfe in the Plains; Scipio admiring the strange aduenture of passing those Mountaines, and the great spirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibal's success; and sudden arriuall. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste vnto Sempronius, the other Consull, that was then in Sicilia giuing him to vnderstand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had bin directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now his pleasure that he should forbear to prosecute any such attempt, but that he should returne the Armie vnder his charge, with all possible speed, to saue Italy it selfe. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Lilybeum; with direction to land the Armie at Arminum, a Port Towne not farre from Rauenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haste. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so neere, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the mindes of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetoricke of a present example, that hee shewed vpon certaine prisoners prisoners of the Servians, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, hauing bene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed, and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be deliuered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slaine, with condition being the Victor, to receiue his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chiefes of the Gauls were wont to vse in single combats. Every one of these unhappy men wished, that his owne lot might speed; whereby it should at least bee his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and hauing none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoeuer vncertain termes, to ridde themselves out of slauiery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordain'd. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his liberty, together with an hoire and armour: but even him also, who being slaine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, beganne to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That hee had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune; that these slaues had done; all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die; or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grievous) to liue in a perpetual slauiery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of escape by flight; since the Mountaines, the Riuers, the great distance from their owne Countie, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. Hee therefore craied them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing that there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had euer bene broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, hee told them, that the Romanes, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, and in view of their owne Townes, who knew as many waies to saue themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity, (to which nothing seemed impossible) did no way presse them, or constrain them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no meane betwene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Captaine of France) la commodité de la retraite aduance la fuite; The commoditie of a retreat, doth greatly aduance a fast running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that hee had giuen order for the laying of a bridge ouer the River of Ticinum, did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Armie he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not onely so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Thebes, than an Armie likelie to encounter the Romanes, but so weather-beaten, and starued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (saith he) yee your selues may make iudgement what daring they haue now remaining, after so manie trauailes and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had passed the Rhone, their horse-men were not onely beaten by ours, and driuen backe to the verie Tranches of their Camp, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approach, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people,

people, both in Africa, and in Sicil. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being farre advanced before the grosse of his Armie, with his Horse, and the Romans hauing allo with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other, Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gauls, to beginne the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betweene their troopes, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, followed softly in good order. The Gauls (whether desirous to trie the mettall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaved themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, shrank at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart, for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gauls main-¹⁰ tained the fight, and did more hurt than they received; as presuming that they were well backed. Neither was the Consull vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardnesse deseruing his aide; and the hasty flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he aduentured himselfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had beene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward furnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slaue. Whilest the Romans were busied in helping their Consull, an vnexpected storme came drining at their backes, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to giue vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compass them about, whilest hee with his men at Armes sustained their²⁰ charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in peeces the scattered foot, that ranne a way at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those whose lookes were fastened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and rowted: so that they all betooke them to their flight, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of Wisedome, hauing lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the exorcement of the tempest ouerooke him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, he in a manner stolet³⁰ his reit, and recouered the bridge ouer Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left sixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should haue passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein hee followed this rule of a good man of warre. Si certamen quandoq; dubium videatur, uictam miles arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this sort: If a Generall of an Armie, by some vnprosperous beginnings doubt the successe; or find his Army fearefull or wauering; it is more profitable to seale a safe retreat, than to abide the vncertaine event of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the Riuer; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not acceptit, nor issue forth of their Campe; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Anerostus, Briamurus, and Gessaters, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to help themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman Campe; wounded and slue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians, and presented their seruice. Hannibal received them exceeding courteously, and dismist them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vse to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates,⁵⁰ than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consull stole a retreat, as hee had done before; but not with the like ease and securitie. Hannibal had a good eyecvpon him; and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoile, had not staid to ransacke their Campe; and thereby giuen time to all, save some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the Riuer of Trebia, and save themselves.

being both vnable to traualle by reason of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to send the comming of his fellow-Consull; incampes himselfe strongly vpon the banks of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day, more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian side; among whom came in the Boy, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeeme their owne Hostages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens & pledges of their affections towards him; by whose helpe they conceiued better hope of recouering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, contempted the taking of Clasidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid vp all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a desire of hasty reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse received; seeing that in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore halted away Sempronius, that was newly arriued, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicil, awaited his comming. Hee therefore halted his horse, and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being ioyned in one, the Consuls deuised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal's arriual; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the reuolt and treason of the Gauls.

Sempronius, hauing receiued from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; fought by all means to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recouered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victory, which hee had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. Hee also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-neere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary, objecting the vnskillfulness of the new-come Souldiers: and withall gaue him good reason, to assure him that the Gauls, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians: those of them inhabiting between the Riuer of Trebia, and Po, being already reuolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonor which he might otherwise easily haue auoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; hee too leste feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gauls inhabiting neere vnto Trebia, complained of iniuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might haue done, although hee daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at libertie, hee had vnderaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, hee was bold to be his owne Caruer, and tooke from them by force, as much as hee needed of that which they had. Heereupon they fled to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to ioine with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: hee suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutabilitie. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honor of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering iniurie; and that hereby might be wonne the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore hee sent out a thousand horse: which comming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal's forragers, and finding them heauy laden, cut many of them in peeces, and chased the rest euen into their owne campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians sallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster then they came. Sempronius was readie to backe his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not retired it.

This victorie (for so the Consull would haue it called) made the Romans in generall desirous desirous to try the maine chance in open field: all the persuasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aduertised by the Gauls, his spies, that were in the Romane Campe. Therefore he berought himselfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: He found in the hollow of a water-courfe, ouer-grown with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambush. There in he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselues in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, hee had sent ouer Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse: to braue the enemye, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunitie to fight: and therefore not only issued out of his Campe, but footed the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: hauing of the one, fixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse: thrusting their light-armed, and Danes, in looser troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equall to their enemies; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares preft in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush: then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies swords; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of fixe and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which euery one deserued to bee recompensed with the losse that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champeine, being by farre inferior in horse, and withall thereby subiect to the African Elephants, which in enclosed or vn-euen grounds and wood-lanes, would haue been of no vse. His second error was, that he made no discouerie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was grossely ouer-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee dencht his footmen with empty stomacks, in the River of Trebia, euening in a most cold and frostie day, whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one faith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perillous, than to present an Armie tyred with traualle, to an enemy fresh and fed: since where the strength of bodie faileth, the generosities of minde is but as an vprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got there-with into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showres; or would not perseeue him, because they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger, flying through the Countie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. He was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Neuerthelesse hee got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following; and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

§. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gauls into Etruria. Flaminius the Romane Consul slain; & his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymen.

The Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vnfit for seruiceto the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Ceremonia. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet: but vexed them with continuall Alarmes; asslaying diuers places; and taking some; beating the Gauls their adherents; and winning the Ligurians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Romane Quæstors or Treasurers, Treasurers, two Colonels and six Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loaden with yrons, and miserably fedde: those of their followers he not only well entreated, but sent them to their Countie without ranfome; with this protestation, That hee therefore vnderooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gauls were not capable of such persuasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countie the seat of Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieued than reason willed them, at this seducing vpon them, and waisting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gaue him the aduice, were readie soon after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. Hee was therefore glad to vse Periwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colours, to the end that hee might not bee deseried, nor knowne, to those that should undertake to make him away. Faine hee would haue passed the Appenines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had seene more Swallows than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of these giddy Companions, and bring the warre neerer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gauls; more seruicable friends, abroad, than in their owne Countie. That the passage of the Appenine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Romane Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was trailing through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all waies foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iourne. Neuerthelesse to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue bene erected vpon the ordinarie passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to traualle through the Fencks and rotten grounds of Tuscanie. In those Marishes and bogges, hee led all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes; by the moistnesse of the ayre, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe myre and water. In briefe, after he had with much adoe recovered the firm and fertile Plainnes; he lodged about Arretium: where hee somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, & Cn. Seruilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this yeere: Seruilius, a tractable man, & wholly governed by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator; who hauing once been robbed (as hee thought) of his Consulship, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be serued so againe, vnlesse hee quickly finished the warre. This iealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome; when hee entered into his Office, lest his aduersaries, by sayning some religious impediment, should detain him within the Citie, or finde other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that he hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore hee departed secretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, reuoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their iniunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, tooke his way to Arretium, where hee shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therefore hee prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman; hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Seruilius came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countie betwene Fesule and Arretium he put to fire and sword, euening vnder the Consul's nose; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not haue sitten still, though Hannibal had bene quiet. It is true, that a great Captaine of France hath said, L'oyauté n'est pas perdue; A wasted Countie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to bee much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemye. Many aduised him (which had indeed bene best) to haue patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to heare: saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians went burning downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore hee rooke horse and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensignes flucke so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Ensigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tullie makes a least: saying, that the cowardlie knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) hauing hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded, that it should be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weake to lift it: asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their iealousie both hee, and the Senate that did giue him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire, which whilst the Consull thought to quench with his enemies bloud, hee pursued Hannibal so vnadvisedly, that hee fell with his whole Armie, into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betwene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was hee charged vnawares, on all sides, (saue onely where that great Lake of Perusia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flie from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make resistance. So was hee slaine in the place, accompanied with fiftene thousand dead carcases of his Countreimen. About fixe thousand of his men, that had the Vanguard, tooke courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way recovered the toppes of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by necessitie, had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was well aswaged, when they ceased to despair, of sauing their liues by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweate, vpon the Hill-top; hearing vnder them a terrible noise, but not any way discouering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellows. But they staid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to bee gone, ere they were desiered, and attacked by the enemies horse. This they should haue thought vpon sooner; since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For desiered they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendering vp their armes, vpon his promise of their liues and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talens, besides their first bargain; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and bee limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present aduantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as a Romane, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiouse gaineeth no more in prosperitie, than it loseth in the change of fortune. Fiftene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his hands: of which all that were not Romans, hee set free without rancome; protesting, as hee had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romans he kept in straight prison, and in fetters, making them learne to eat hard meate. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall libertie, but onely the preferring of her owne necke from the yoke of slaerie, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neere vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Seruilus the other Consull, to increase the strength of Flaminius; but coming too late, hee increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this company; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow; charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yielded to mercie, the next day. Seruilus himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Carthages; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleague's ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular iealousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yeerely change of their Commanders in the warres; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errors, than by the examples of their fore-goes. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken vp but the yeere before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered hee himselfe to bee caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also be-like forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to bee preuented by a new Consull, and ambitious of the sole honor of bearing Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would hee not, contrary to all good aduice, haue beene so hasty to fight, before the arrivall of Seruilus. If Sempronius had beene continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consull Flaminius neglected. We may holdly know it, that by being continued in his gouernment of France 10. yeeres, Cesar taught that mightie Nation, together with the Heluetians and many of the Germanes, vnder the Romane yoke; into which parts had there bene euery yeere a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if euer, haue beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Riues, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wise as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Government, siring the Countie, they haue beene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great preiudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath euer bene the course of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their slothfull ignorance, by the olde examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

§. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, fought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lining Warre. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and aduanced by the People, for bold and successfull attempting, aduantes rashly vpon Hannibal; and is like to perish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

Greatly werethe Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than euer did war, since come it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers, and so little accustomed to receiue an ouerthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee honestly sought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie: demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, & his ability. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long bin out of vse, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject vnto controuersie of the whole Citi. Wherefore this Officer was fildome chosen, but vpon some excecutive, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. Hee was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consull (if he stood vpon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consull being dead, and the other too farre off, the People rooke vpon them, as hauing supreme authoritie, to giue the Dignitie by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warre in the Citie. Novum sa. Tum, novum consilium expetit, Con- trarie vias, contrarie courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the Horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion:
a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion bene also good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gave direction in this businesse of deuotion; then must we beleue, that these bookes of Sybil, preferred in Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, & amplified; as hauing not bin rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto Impier, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distemper'd with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sons returne aliue from Thermyne, may serue to beare witness; though it be more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towners of the City were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuer were broken downe; and all care taken for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal; word was brought that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthagi- nians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Consull to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome and Ostia, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended vpon Han- nibal. Four^e Legions he had leui'd in haste: and from Ariminum he receiued the Armie, which Servilius the Consull had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affright him. And knowing well, what aduantage the Numidian horse had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrey, and vsed all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to bear armes. Passing by Spoleum and Ancora, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trauail'd Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoils that he had gotten. Hauing refreshed his Army; fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of his scratches, by walking their pawterns in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Nor-therne Prouince of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ran, he had not taken any one Ci-tie: only he had assaied Spoleum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer. The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poitiers, a little before the bat-taille of Moncouster; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at St. Iuan d'Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. Hee would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detaine him, and giue the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end hee presented Fabius with battaile, as soone as he saw him; and prouoked him with all manner of brauado's. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences, betwene Souldiers bred vp, eu' since they were Boyes, in warre and in blood, trayned and hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no other seen the enemy, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so nere, as hee kept him from straggling too farre; and preferred the countrey from viter spoyle. He inured his men by litle and litle, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon at farre off, that in the end they might sit on his taile.

Now

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxing Fa- bius with cowardise and care. But all stirred not this well-aduised Commander. For while men are no more moued with such noise, than with wilde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indirection, and danger, than to pursue misfortune: It resteth in selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Armie that destroys battaile: and thus of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apennines, and to fall vpon the most rich and pleasant Territorie of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to aduance the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weake in horse, he alwaies kept the Hills & fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this warie Di-tator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Townes stood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though a farre off; he reloued to rest his Armie, that was laden with spoyle, in some plentifull and assured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must pisse along by the Dictators Campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the Hills of Callicula, and Casilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly Garden-countrey, which he had already wasted; into places more abundant of prouision for his wintering. It was by meere leuerrour of his guide, that he first entered within these streights. For he would haue bin directed vnto Casilinum, whence he might both assay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him specially promises vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from coming nere it to prevent him. But his guide mis-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him away another way, from Casilinum to Casilinum, whence Fabius hoped that hee should not easily escape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory, without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a slight inuention, yet seruing the turne as well as a better. In driving the Countrey, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose barnes he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driuen vp the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be a worke of a terrible enemy. What it should meane, Fa- bius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when some of these fire Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behinde their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians; that were no lesse afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recovered sure ground; without molestation: where he stayed till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans; that began to hold them in skirmish:
After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his iournie towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the worsted manner; keeping still on high grounds, betwene him and the Citie, whilst the Carthaginian wasted all the Plains. The Carthaginian tooke to Ceryn, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, and incamped vnder the broken wall. Other manner of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiency. He was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spa- niards: by whom if they had bene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtiltie and ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to prevent.
All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred by iudge-ment of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius.
In this iollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had hee bene peremptorily for-bidden so to doe, by the Dictator: the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victory, which heeld vndoubtedly his owne; and the loue of the Armie; and the friends that hee had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to fauor him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer so hainously. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more adventurous gamester. Therefore he drew neerer; & to prouoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Armie to waste the Countrey. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped

incamped hard by him: but it seemes, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betweene the two campe; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, was in from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their neerer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to prouide abundantly, not onely for his men, but for his horses, which he knew to be the chiefe of his strength, that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could giue the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrey at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harrest. This aduantage Minutius wisely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, hee sent abroad against the forragers: who being disperfed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This engered Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans tooke heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceived that it was meer weakenesse, which held him within his Campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuertheless he did not such hurt, as hee had received.

For this peece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he sent die newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne Campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better, that the Roman Armie had recovered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne Campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: sauing that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so ioyfull of a little good lucke, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that hee would reach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him giue account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons euery one cried out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speak, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said hee) that this our onely Man, chosen to be General, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Rome to be waisted before his eyes, to the utter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consull all this while; Servilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and hee, haue as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeede forborne to spoyle some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into enuie and suspicion) and the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoyle all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sole Governement both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But lest, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him iniurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the House may be ioyned in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so inuitious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that Dignity, whose great power, had freed the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Onely C. Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had bene Praetor, was glad of such an opportunitie, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher, afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbling, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens caules. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very baseness. And now he thought the time was come, for him to giue a hard puth at the Consullship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hoc inuective, not onely against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie, saying, That it grieved them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Governement; That they sought to humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impoverish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would soone consume euery poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise: and since they had found one, (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrey, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authority accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as he had begun. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consull, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the room of C. Flaminius: and hauing finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiuing well, that he should not be able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The news of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to diuide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successiually, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should neuer be his superiour: Hee would therefore diuide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuertheless he meant to doe his best, and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and a halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Liuius seems to tax him for it) that he should so doe. For where two severall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto another, nor ioyned in Commission, but haue each entire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Campe shall not hold them both, without great inconueniencie. Pelgusius neither findes fault with this disfunction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chiefe successiually (as the two Consuls vied) with Minutius, by turnes. Hee saith that Minutius was very refractory, and so proud of his aduancement, that continually hee opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to diuide the forces betweene them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouerall by course. This is likely to be true. For Nature impatient of subiection, when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authoritie, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the prooffe and assurance of their libertie.

It

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of auoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Countrey lying betweene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adioyning, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot, thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discouered. But left by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes; hee made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a peece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needefull care, to businesse litle concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduention vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retreat. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves, losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neere, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Capitaine, perceiving a farre off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe, and his followers, did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countrey, than the disgrace which hee had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approue himselfe: by halting to doe good, than by suffering his enemy to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retyred: feare to be well wetted with a shower, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to haue bene saved. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilst his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neerer within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corficans; passed ouer into Africke; and there negligently falling to spoyle the Countrey, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicily; and (being forewarned by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consull, wherethey tooke charge of the Armie.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces leuied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

With litle pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were giuen to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeede preferred them from receiuing a great ouerthrow: but he had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparence thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome: since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honorable to doe iust nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his owne private losse, vpon the ill administration of the publique.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being litle or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Commi-

Committallie were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Whereinto helpe, he had a kinsman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vse the liberty of his place; in saying what hee listed, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stucke not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeede with his two Legions, was likely to haue bene ouerthrowne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had all bene ioyned together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victory of Minutius, when he commanded ouer all as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Consull, the warre would neuer be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians, as had long since bene aduanced to honour by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contained the manner sort, euer since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needefull to choose a Consull, who should be altogether a Plebeian; a meere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could wish more, than to keepe it, by well deseruing of them. By such perswasions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honour; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was allaged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe depose; either (as was pretended, for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at that time were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successively, by the space of five daies, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Fingers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited onely vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls; and put in vse, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The aduantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would haue it, there needed no more, than to slip five daies, and then was all to begin a new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well asswaged. Vpon which change of those that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publiquely declare themselves to seeke those Offices. But no choice would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer, and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was beleued) of this meane, but worthy man, seemed fo manifest, that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, onely Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gaue out. For wheremen of ordinary marke had stood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that, to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpet, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiency, and reputation, should be ioyned with him, as both Companion and opposite. So L. Aemilius Paulus, he who few yeeres since had ouer-come the Ulyrians; and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobility to stand for the place: which he easily obtained, hauing no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good seruice; He, and M. Livius that had bene his companion in Office, were afterwards iniuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto iudgement: wherein Livius was condemned, and Aemilius hardly escaped. But of this iniustice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying in the most grievous losse; the other brauely winning, in the most happy victory that euer befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he

he would worke, and that he would aske no more, than onco to haue a fight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the providence and care of Paulus, trauielled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Seruilus and Attilius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuerthelesse, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, & weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might finde the four old Legions well accustomed to the Enemy, and the Enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the slanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised it is vncertaine. Fourescore thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Here, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercenaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by hauing them somewhat euently ballanced. He gaue them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might direct the warre from home. His gifts, and good aduice were louingly accepted; and instructions were giuen to Titus Otililius the Pretor, which was to goe into Sicily, that he should accordingly passe ouer into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more serue to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawne into the field, and fitted for seruice. For besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twentie five thousand, with L. Posthumus Albinus another of the Pretors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Prouince, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip the sonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing bene their subiect, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they receiued, it is not knowne: onely this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth began to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the shifts that they were driuen soone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little soeuer) would haue bene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauil about forfeiture for non payment of the whole.

Whilst the Citie was buied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as neere vnto Hannibal, as possibly as they could, without incurring the necessity of a battaile. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their successfe for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not onely blemished the honour of their other seruices, but was it: deede the occasion, to draw on the misery following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him lodged about Cannussum; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aside for all necessities, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Canna: for the towne was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not onely furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vntill they would be troubled with farre carriage. Besides this, and more to his aduantage, hee enabled himselfe to abide in that open Country, fit for the seruice of his horse: longer than the Romans, hauing so many mouthes to feede, could well endure to tarry, without offering battaile, which he most desired. Of this mispass when Seruilus had informed the Senate, letting them vnderstand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would serue him to command no small part of the Countrey adiacent; it then seemed needfull, euen vnto the Fathers themselves, to aduencure a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the ground of of Italia. Neuerthelesse, answer was returned vnto Seruilus, that he should haue patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as needed required.

When all things were ready in the Citie, and the season of the yeere commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their armies, set forth against Hannibal. This was already done with great solemnity: especially, when soeuer they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemy, for Sacrifices, and solemn Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good successe and victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall incursions (not onely such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for loyng, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leave-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited vpon Amilius Paulus, as the onely Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honor, or likely to doe his countrey remarkable seruice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens: a troupe no lesse in greatnesse, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is said to haue exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many graue words, to shew his magnanimity, not onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which hee thought harder) in bridling the outrageous follie of his fellow-Consull. The answer of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrey: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, hee would thinke it lesse himselfe to aduencure vpon the Enemies sword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diffention betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was vpon point of flying out of Italia, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Canna.

These new Generals, arriving at the Campe, dismissed M. Atilius one of the last yeeres Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weaknesse: Seruilus they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Amilius thought necessary, was, to hearken his Souldiers with good words: who out of their bad successfe hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not onely now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their owne great numbers: which were no lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrey stood; how the state and safety thereof rested vpon their hands; vsing some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectfull part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plaine force and valour: but that onely by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill hee was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they truck off his head, by reason of the thicke mist, through the darkness whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snars. Finally, declaring what aduantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helpes, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that vnder a Captaine so well experienced, and euery way sufficient, as Amilius was knowne to be, they should easily preuaile against the Carthaginians: that came short of them in all things else, saue craft; which would not alwayes thriue. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should haue heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiying a convenient season. But they, hauing preconceiued a victory, thought all delays to be impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembered what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein since Emilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them bear to vie it? This thought the common Souldier: And thus also thought the Consul Terentius; who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than he had bene in the Citie. Expectation is alway tedious; and neuer more, than when the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who hastned their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to have the better of their Enemies, they so fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Diffusion of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Emilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten vp his last yeares provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Haruest? This would (said Varro) favour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth shew no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Emilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vnteven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take pains to come; he doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheless he late downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden guest gaue him but a rude welcome and interrainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell vpon the Roman Vancourers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilst it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troups weighly armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Emilius, who could not handliely withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Ausidus, sending a third part of his forces over the water, to lye vpon the Easterne banke, where they encrenched themselves. He neuer was more vnwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground serued wholly for the advantage of his enemies; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equal teames. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Cannus, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessities: whereof an Armie forraging the Countrey, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed over with silence, That Liue differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had bene driuen; and of base counsels that he deuised to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. Hee had (saith Liue) but tenne dayes prouision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruely Rabble, gathered out of severall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to start exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prorant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and runne over to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stole away into Gaul with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lacke of all other counsaile, he resolved to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early haruest. But whilst he was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him to that, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaigne ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Liue, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also hee may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus hee saith; Hannibal de fugâ in Galliam (dicitur) agitasse; Hannibal (d'ait) to have brought himselfe of flying into Gaul: where he makes it no more then a matter of heere-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the proceesse itselfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaul, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victualles enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this year; especially seeing he had plaid the careful husband in making a great haruest; since he had long bene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surpris, no small part of the Roman provisions? Sure hee vnto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but come and cartails; his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie: and had so well increased his stocke, since he came into that Countrey, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and laden his followers with spoyle: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Armie free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations, no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might hee so doe, hauing not onely pronounced, That which of his men fouer fought brauely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested & sworn, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaul, was a senselesse deuice. Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, took so little pleasure in the Countrey and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now doe there with his horse? or how could he be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to lye, hauing betrayed all his Army; and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Liue. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians loue to extoll their owne Countrymen; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honor of the victory taken from the Enemy, and giuen vnto blinde Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgouernment of their own forces: as if they might easily haue won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the Riuer Ausidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vse his owne authority; and, without any more disposing of the matter to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day he began to passe the Riuer, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to haue dissuaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrey to a needlesse hazard. Against whose words and substantiall arguments, Terentius could alludge none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians ouer the Riuer but euen the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to assaile: must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Emilius perceived, that hee could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; he took all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Tenne thousand Roman foot hee caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leaue behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity hee was lesse able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight began, & taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heate of fight. This done, the two Consuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the lesser Campe, whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and without any delay, passed likewise over, somewhat higher up the streame, which ran from the South; leaving in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He had them looke about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said hee) pray for any greater fortune, than to ioyne battle with the Romans upon such a leuell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said hee further) ye are first of all to thank the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Vs, that have trained them along, and drawne them into necessity of playing for their lives, where they are sure to loose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when ye met them first: but now ye may even encourage your selves, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as scene. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects; as, to drive them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Countrey, and fields of Italy; both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the riches within them, which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, ye shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this, his brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to have with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them never so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladdened the souldiers, who thought their Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant onely to correct the sad moode of his brother with a jest, and shew himselfe merry unto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himselfe had bene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Capitaine Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made unto our King Henrie the sixth: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Even such words as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serve many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke upon such passions, as must govern more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatesse in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousness of the place, into which he had long before conceiued the means to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Armie in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where euerly one might doe best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troups, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdus; but when we use our owne termes, the former hope. The groffe of his Armie following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Turlymen, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these he ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed each after their owne Countrey manner; their shields alike; but the Gauls vsing long broad swords, that were forcible in a downe-right stroake; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gauls, naked from their nauell vpwards, as confident in their owne fierceness: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple.

This

This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitie, made a gallant show, and terrible, because strange. The Gauls were strong of body, and furious in giving charge, but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more wary; neither ashamed to giue ground, when they were over-pressed; nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, upon any small encouragement. As the roughness of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence ioynly unto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spain, by their Conquests; and in Gaul, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamitie should fall upon them, whilst the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to imploy the uttermost of their hardiness, as knowing that the Enemy could not presse farre upon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retreat. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gauls and Spaniards to advance; leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should be over-hardly pressed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, He made them as it were his Van-guard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thin, as serving onely to guide it orderly backe, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened and thicked against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have bene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brass, as I have scene of this Battaille, present it more narrow: with little reason, as shall anone appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were assistance Reare, to second the Gauls and Spaniards, when they were driven to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betweene the last ranks of his long battalions, and in the head of his Reare, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betweene the left battalion and the River Auslus, were the Gauls and Spanish horse, vnder the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plains, was Amno (Linie saith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Reare. The whole sum of Hannibal's Armie in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and fourie thousand foot; his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and Hee, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the vsuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had bene found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former war. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long, as also to strengthen well the Reare; that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troups might rally themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battalies accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horse, against which, this manner of embattailing was very vnprofitable forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than upon a long flanke. As for Emilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant, and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very weakness unto the more contentious. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horse-men, vnder the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Servilius the former yeeres Consul, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

slingers of the Baleares: Asdrubal brake vpon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountered; not after the manner of seruice on horse-backe, vsed in those times, wheeling about Almas-like; but each giuing on in a right line. Pouldron to Pouldron, as hauing the Riuer on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wherefore they not onely vsed their Lances and Swords; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from vnder them, fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they began to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouer-borne, and driuen by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to be resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horsemanship. ¹⁰ When the battailes came to ioyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more then enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell: so strongly for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foote make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaile drew towards the midst; by whose aide, these Opposites were forced to disband, and flye backe to their first place. This they did in great haste and feare: and were with no lesse haste, and folly pursued. Vpon the Africans that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was voide roome enough; and forasmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retrait, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards, ²⁰ it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limbe or vtter compass of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, onely turning round, and recoyling very little. Some Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe circle; which they should not haue needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin. cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilst the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselves deeply with ³⁰ in the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side aduanced so farre, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without remouing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least ease. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as couered the Africans, who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled vnawares; and that they behaued themselves, as men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would haue bene so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulke of their ⁴⁰ Armie, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of sight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed vpon them along the Riuer side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuertheless he cheered vp his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his owne stout behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile, and with better successe. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weaknesse, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his ⁵⁰ company company alighted, thinking that the Consul had giuen order so to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to helpe their foot in distress. When Hannibal (for he was neere at hand) perceiued this, and vnderstood that the Consul had willed his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would haue deliuered them vnto me bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of his associates, in the left wing, was maruellously troubled by Hannibal (or Marbels) and the Numidians: who beating vp and downe about that great sandy Plaine, raised a foule dust; which a strong Southwinde, blowing there accustomarily, draue into the eyes and mouthes of the Romanes. These, vling their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him a happy day of it. For when the battailes were euen ready to ioyne, five hundred of these Numidians came picking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behinde their backs, (as was the manner of those which yielded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendered themselves. This was good lucke to beginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, vnweaponed as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where hee bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty aduenturers did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Vnder their iackets they had short swords and ponyards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slaine, and therewithall flew vpon the hindmost of the Romanes, whilst all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine leuell ground, found means to lay an ambush at the backe of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was giuen by the same hand which gaue the first. Asdrubal, hauing in short space broken the Roman troups of horse, and cut in pieces all, saue the Companie of Amilius that rushed into the grolle of his foot, and a very few besides, that recoured some narrow passage, between the Riuer and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell backe behinde the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians: with whom he ioynd, and gaue vpon Terentius.

This fearefull cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme vnto those, vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to sustaine; thought it the best way, to auoid the danger by present flight. The Consull was no lesse wise than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in struing to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many thranke from him, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not haue endured with their assistance. Now hee found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this, or of ought else, expressing hastie flight, his present leisure would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troups, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fittest for that seruice. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gauls and Spanisb horse, compassing about, fell vpon the backes of the Romanes; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else. Hee brake them easily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on euery side, not knowing which way to turne. Heere began a pittifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, as they knew not whither or which way, whilst euery one sought to auoid those enemies, whom he lay neerest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Amilius, got vp to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleue it, than suppose that Linus so reporteth, to grace thereby his Historie with this following tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place, where hee saw the Consull sitting all bloudied vpon a stone, entreated him to rise and saue himselfe; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lentulus to shift for himselfe, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose so to bee brought againe into indgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guiltie himselfe.

himselfe of that dayes losse. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome, as fast and well as they could; and telling Fabius, that hee lined and died mindefull of his whole (some counsaile. These words (peraduenture) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaille, or when he beheld the first defeat of his Horse; at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Confull & his troupe, in little better case than if they had beene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeede as within a sacke; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginian, the bottome; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed vp the mouth: in which part, they first of all were shuffled together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Amilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilst the battaille yet lasted, and whilst the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might haue withdrawne himselfe; was now (had he neuer so well bin mounted) unable to flie, hauing in his way so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell aspace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaille he fought no lesse valiantly, than he had wonly before, both obtained himselfe, and dissuaded his fellow-Confull, from fighting at all. If, when the day was vtterly lost, it had laine in his power to saue his own life, vnto the good of his Countrey, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much disesteemed himselfe; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his vnthankfull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Amilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Viscount Lisle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsburie, who died in the Battaille of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Amilius was old, grievously, if not mortally, wounded, and acceptable for the overthrow receiued: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, vnhurt, easily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when hee refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the losse of the battaille, and not meaning to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone and leaue him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, saue two or three thousand, who (as Linie saith) escaped into the lesser campe, whence, the same night, about sixe hundred of them brake forth, and ioyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselves away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troupes, partly dispersed, into Cannusum: the next day, the Roman Camps, both lesse and greater, were yeeled vnto Hannibal by those that remained in the m. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: onely he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Amilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-neere done, the battaille was lost: and Hannibal, comming ouer the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeeled, hauing lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first sight of Hannibal, comming vpon them with his victorious Armie, a greater number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilst their fellowes, making defence in vaine, retired into their campe, and held the enemye buified. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that hauing serued at Canna, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped, it is vncertaine: but very few they were that saued themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Consul recovered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his companie. That hee was so ill attended, it is no maruell: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neere way thither, had beene through the midst of Hannibal's Armie, if the passage had beene open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned vp some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but tooke other waies, and were scattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or thereabouts, were gathered vp by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all saue three hundred; who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led led them, and got into sundry Townes. There died in this great Battaille of Canna, besides L. Aemilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Queſtors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, foureſcore Senators, or ſuch as had borne Office, out of which they were to be choſen into the Senate. Many of theſe were of ſpeciall marke, as hauing bene Ædiles, Praetors, or Conſuls: among whom was Cn. Seruilius the laſt yeeres Conſul, and Minutius, late maſter of the horſe. The number of priſoners, taken in this battaille, Liuie makes no greater than three thouſand foote, and three hundred horſe: too few to haue defended for the ſpace of one halfe houre, both the Roman Camps; which yet the ſame Liuie ſaith, to haue been ouer-cowardly yeelded vnto. We may therefore doe better, to giue credit vnto one of the priſoners, whom the ſame Hiſtorian ſhortly after introduceth, ſpeaking in the Senate, and ſaying, That they were no leſſe then eight thouſand. It may therefore be, that theſe three thouſand were only ſuch as the Enemie ſpared, when the furie of Execution was paſt: but to theſe muſt be added about ſiue thouſand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their companies were either ſlaine or fled. So the reckoning falls outright: which the Romanes, eſpecially the conſull Varro, had before caſt vp (as we ſay) without their Hoſt: nothing ſo chargeable, as now they finde it. On the ſide of Hannibal there died ſome foure thouſand Gauls, ſiſteene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horſe, or thereabouts: a loſſe not ſenſible, in the ioy of ſo great a victorie; which if he had purſued, as Mahabal aduiſed him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had preſently bene at an end. But hee beleeued not ſo farre in his owne proſperitie; and was therefold told, That hee knew how to get, not how to loſe, a victorie.

Of things following the battaille at Canna.

Not without good cauſe doth Polybius reprehend thoſe two Hiſtorians, Fabius the Roman, and Philius the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleaſure of writing, vnto whoſe honour they conſecrated their trauailes, than the truth of things, and information of poſteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Writers, and Fathers conſcript. No man of ſound iudgement will condemne this libertie of cenſure, which Polybius hath vſed. For, to recompence his iniurie, (ſuch as it was) he produceth ſubſtantiall arguments, to iuſtifie his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanitie of thoſe former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill co-hering: which paines it is to be ſuſpected, that he would not haue taken, had hee bene borne in either of theſe two Cities, but haue ſpared ſome part of his diligence, and bene contented, to haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deſerued, of his owne Countrey. The like diſeaſe it is to be feared, that we ſhall heereafter finde in others; and ſhall haue ſome cauſe to wiſh, that either they were ſomewhat leſſe Roman, or elſe, that ſome Workes of their oppoſite Writers were extant, that ſo we might at leaſt heare both ſides ſpeake: being henceforth deſtitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But ſince this cannot bee, wee muſt bee ſometimes bold, to obſerue the coherence of things; and beleue ſo much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reaſon, or (at leaſt) ſure probability. This attentive circumſpection is needfull at the preſent: ſuch is the repugnantie, or forgetfulneſſe, which we finde in the beſt Narration, of things following the Battaille of Canna. For it is ſaid, that foure thouſand foot and horſe gathered together about the Conſul Terentius at Venuſia; that others to the number of ten thouſand got into Cannuſum, choſing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudiuſ; yet that the Conſull Terentius Varro, ioyning his company vnto thoſe of Scipio at Cannuſum; wrote vnto the Senate, that he had now well-neere tenne thouſand men about him; that theſe letters of the Conſull were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly riſen, that had bene taking order for pacifying thoſe tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the firſt bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embaſſadours from Capua (after ſome conſultation, whether it were meet to ſend any, or without further circumſtance, to ſide with Hannibal) were ſent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venuſia, a prettie while before he wrote thoſe letters, which ouer-tooke (in a maner) at Rome the firſt newes of the ouerthrow.

ouerthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutuall dependence in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman campe, and trusted vp the spoiles, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Sannium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Cassa, where hee laid vp his baggage: and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He halted into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not onely in regard of their grievous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romanes themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Countrey, especially the 10 poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he vsed, vnto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Canna, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so oblitinate, against him that had fought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their loue by gifts; pretending to admire their valour; but seeking indeed, by all waies and means, to make them his, whilest all other motives were concurrent. At this time also hee began to deale kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them, that hee bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being provoked by iniuries, sought to right himselfe and his Countrey; and fought with them, to 20 trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soveraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to chooe ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransom: and together with these, hee sent Caribalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and General of his Horse, to seele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoope vnto desire of peace. But with the Romanes these arts prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all, or most of them, sate the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not onely wearie of their losses past, but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their olde Societie for a better. Wherefore not onely the Sammies, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vnto 30 till the former generation vtterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits; but the Campanians, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the state of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as strictly conioyned, as were any other the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not (as somethen thought) of all the Earth: and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrey, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soveraigne command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like layes by their feathers, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romanes their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the Maiestic of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Inuouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was gouerned by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calanius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the coniunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their Citie to the Carthaginians, shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iourne into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the necessity of the Romane Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindered them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romanes, by gentle vsage, and free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without aduice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld vp their town to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him him of all faithfull meanings were driuen to sit still in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romanes. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incited against their Senate; on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their owne cowardize. The people holding so tender a regard of libertie, that euen the lawfull Government of Magistrates grieved them; with an imaginary oppression; had now good cause to feare lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by helpe of the Romanes, bringe them vnder a more straight subiection, than euer they had endured. This feare, being ready to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made use of, to sate his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they sate in Council, about these motions troubling the Citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and giuen his Daughter in marriage to a Roman; but, that the danger of forsaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the People were violently bent to murder all the Senate; and after to ioyne themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and saue them harmelesse. This hee spake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himselfe by the People, and priuie vnto their designs. Hauing thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: Hee promised next the least to deliuer them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freele put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leaue; He called the people to assembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as hee knew they would be glad to heare, hee told them, that these wicked Gouernours were surprised by his policie, and all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Onely thus much he aduised them, as a thing which necessity required, That they should chooe a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the olde. So rehearsing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their iudgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Choofe then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Heereat the Multitude, vnprovided for such an election, was silent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentured to name whom hee thought fit. The men so nominated, were vtterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some known fault, basenesse, and insufficiency, or else euen because they were vnknown, and therefore held vnworthy. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whilest more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, hauing bene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius entreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtlesse) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not onely the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for sauing all their liues. Neither did the Senate faile after this by all obsequiousnesse, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Will, who else were likely to cast them down: All the City being thus of one minde; onely feare of the Romanes kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaille at Canna, this impediment was remoued: and few there were, that would open their mouths to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serue the Romanes in the Isle of Sicily: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadors were sent vnto Terentius the Consul; to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wherefoeuer they found him, found him weakely attended, and as weakely in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the seruice of their Senate; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them the greatnesse of the Romane misfortune: saying, that all was lost; and that the Campanians must now, not helpe the Romanes, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romanes had sometimes done for the Campanians against the Sammies. Heereunto he said to haue added a foolish Inuocatie against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcasses, and to feed vpon mans flesh; with such other stuffe, as onely bewtraied his owne feare. As for the Campanians themselves,

He put them in minde of their present strength; they having thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse; with monie, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder then they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in adventuring to seeke their owne libertie. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made alliance, vpon these conditions: That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Laws; That no Citizens of theirs should be subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in War or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Roman prisoners, such as themselves would chooseth, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicily.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honourable Citizen opposed himselfe earnestly: yfing, in vaine, many persuasions, to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Epyrius and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change olde friends for new acquaintance. This did hee, when they were sending Embassadors vnto Hannibal: and this also did hee, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the Towne: at which time hee gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was giuen to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon halsted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the wals too high, & was not well provided to lay siege vnto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnitie and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainments; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italic and Rome it selfe, should be deuiant to acknowledge: Capua as chief; and receiue Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campian, but a Traitor to the State: and vse him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserued. This was granted: and Magius deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Campans, at his first coming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if he kept him alie, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, onely this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal, whilest he was at supper, the first night of his coming; had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the Towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casilum, and Acerre, were the Citie next adioyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leaue all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals coming, at the first report of the ouerthrow at Cannae: and the griefe of that losse was so generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the prouision against apparent danger. It was hard to iudge, whether the losse already receiued, or the feare of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to stint the noyle and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Couriers were sent sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went; whereof when Letters from the Consull Varro had thoroughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal bookes, buried daile two men and women Gauls and Greekes in their Ox-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them such instructions; we may iustly thinke, that Sibyl her selfe was instructed by the Diuelli. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-sayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards, for their own honor, (as I shalld of such Authors impute to the bookes of Sibyl). An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult with the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayes & supplications they might pacifie the gods, & obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discouer their great feare; though not serving to giue remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicily, from the Praetor Octacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if hee found it meet, to passe ouer into Africa. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian Fleet, that wasted the Kingdome of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Hebrages, which was in readines to set vpon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Praetor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the middle of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terrinius the Consull, that he might name a Dictator, to take soueraigne charge of the Weale publique, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seeme strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consull, and bid him welcome home; giuing him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weale publique. But this was done: (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtles) provided wisely, for vpholding the generall reputation. If his coming into the Citie had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people: what else would haue followed, than a contempt of their wretchednes, among those that were subiect vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome; and thanks; they noyled abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal; of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seeme grounde for their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done: But whereas Liue would haue vs thinke, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleeue him not: It was done fearefully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to show their indignation, they would haue struck off his head; as in few yeres after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a similar offence. M. Iunius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and a 1000. horse: though with much difficulty; as being faine to take vp some, that were very Boyes. These foure Legions are elswhere forgotten, in accompt of the forces leuiet by this Dictator; and two Legions onely set downe, that had bin enrolled in the beginning of the yere for custodie of the Citie. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field, foure new ones of Præextator striplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, & so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them 2000. sturdy slaues that were put in hope of libertie, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This notwithstanding, the Dictator proclaimed, that who soeuer ought mony and could not pay, nor had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the war. To arme these 6000. men, they were faine to take down, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bin thence set vp; among which, were 6000. Armors of the Gauls, that had bin cartied in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were faine to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannae, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilest he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captiues, audience was giuen by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the public charge, not onely the reares & lamentation of their poore kinfolke, but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their sure; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former Warre) not to begettend to such as had yielded to the enemy; much was alleged against these who now ^{crowd} ran loose: but the speciall point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money: and therefore could not want excoles, whereby to auoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the slaves which were armed for the warre, are said to haue cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would haue ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, deuiled to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had bene seuerer; when as indeed they were futable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggerly. Hereof it is no little proofe, That Hannibal valud those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than eury one the third part of a common Souldiers ranfome: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, wherat hee thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for slaves might haue bene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with priuate men; yet must we withall consider, that these priuate men did onely lendth sell us for 20 a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forsake the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the War should be ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen such long day of payment; it is likely that the Romans would haue bene his Chapmen: but seeing he dealt onely for ready money, they chose rather to say, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like aueritie, vpon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was vied toward the souldiers that escaped from that great Battaille. These were charged for hauing fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done so. True it is, that in such cases (if euer) that which they call ragione del Stato may serue for an excole: when the Common-wealth being drin to a miserable exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing iniuries to priuate men. 30 And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had serued at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serue, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twenty yeeres in the Warres, or else were fifty yeeres of age; but vntill this Warre should be ended, how long sooner it lasted, and that without reuward. The same thrifty censure, was afterwards laide vpon others, for their misbehaviour: but neuer vpon any man of quality, saue only (a good while after this, at better leisure) vpon Cacilius Metellus, and a few other hare-brained fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wittes, with the terror of so great a losse, were deusing, after the battaille, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed 40 by a Tribune of the People; neuertheless it was quietly digested, the excole being no lesse apparent then the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with foure and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he spent the time about Campania: where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans: in this their weak estate, onely Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prators, lay at Ofia with a Fleet, ready to set saile for Sicily, hauing one Legion aboard his ships, and fiftene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces hee 50 was to defend that Island, and doe what harme he could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Canna, hee sent these of his new Leuy to Rome, for defence of the Citie, and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannusium: deliuering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrats, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanians) to let in the Carthaginian, and knew not how to auoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberat about the articles of this new Confederacy. Wherefore hee made great iournies thitherward; and arrived euen time enough enoughto prevent the Enemy. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: allaying by faire words, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was strong and not infected with any the least touch of disloyalty: had also a sure Haven; whereby it stood in the lesse feare, of sustaining much inconuenience, by spoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poore people were viterly vndone. So thought the Multitude, and such talke vied, that had little feare of their own priuate want or pouerty, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Banius was chiefe; a stout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of 10 speciall make, well beloued in the Citie, and one that had done good seruice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle vllage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberal gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thanks hee could vnto so courtesious an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought vpon the same este nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had bene by chance; seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserued of the Roman state, had not repaired vnto him the Prator, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly repared for his personall valour, he made this Banius so farre in loue with him; that no- 20 thing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whercof he had not presently aduertisement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal remoued from about Nola; and allayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; vpon confidence whercof they gaue him a prempciose answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he took by composition; and so returned backe againe to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durst not stirre in his quarrell, being awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus, hardly bestead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting vnto the accomplishment of their owne desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but onely to 30 make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which he sought in the meane while to keepe by intelligence. In the night-time there passed messages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne could presently rise; and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly aduenteure, euen to find him busied within the Citie, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the walles; hee thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes: Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three seuerall gates looking to- 40 wards the enemy: He gaue a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, eury day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walles were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bade his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very wals, and thought nothing lesse, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, wherat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected fallly the more 50 more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, wherat in like sort issued they of the new leued Companies, vpon the enemies backs. The sudden terror was more auailable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and repured one of the briskest Actes performed in all that Warre; forasmuch as hereby it was first proofed, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict accompt of the Citizens of Nola: condemning about three score three score and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the Town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went & encamped hard by about Suessula, Hannibal in the meane season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it not wisdom to lose time in perswasions, but laide siege vnto it, and began on all sides to close it vp. This terrified the People, who knew themselves vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Towne empty: which he lacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling that an Enemy so neere should disquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It seemes, or rather indeed it is plaine, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated to the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden eruption; wimeth chiefly, in what great feare they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that hauing three yeeres since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes to heare, That in a skirmish not farre from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not resistlesse. At Caslinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Towne, and held it. Five hundred of the Præstines there were, and about foure hundred of Persia, with some of the Laines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaille at Canne, being sent by their severall States to the Campe: whether whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountered them, and sent them backe sorrowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder whose government they liued happily. So came they all, one after another to Casiline, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Præstines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laide one for another, at last they slew all the Townefmen in a night, and fortified the Westerne part of the Towne (for it was diuided by the Riuer Vulturius) against the Enemy. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were as the rest of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themselves might haue bene reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place withstood, vpon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to haue encountered with greater forces: but these few found him more worke then hee expected. Diuers assaults hee gaue, but was still repelled with losse: and many sallies they made, with variable euent. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much indurty to his force, that he was driuen to close them vp, and seeke to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Army higher vp the Riuer: who saue would haue relieved Casiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had giuen him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the ouerflowings of Vulturius; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leaue them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water stayed his journey, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrels of corne were sent by night, floating down the Riuer; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, stuck among the Willows on the banke, whereby this mannner of reliefe was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantie of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustained the poore besieged men. At length when all foode was spent, and whatsoeuer grew greene vnder the Walles was gathered for Sallers; the Carthaginians ploughed vp the ground: whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and saide, That he meant not to stay at Casiline, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto he had refused to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent reason, which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Casiline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes; vnto whom he restored it. To the Præstine Souldiers great thanks were giuen, and louing rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Præstine: which is no weak proofe, of the good estate wherin the Cities flourished, that were subiect to the Roman Government. This siege of Casiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as hauing long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise haue bene better spent. For Winter ouer-tooke him, long before hee could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honour hee knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where hee refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate, though, effeminate as it was; He therewithall did often beare the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

¹⁰ Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to Hannibal into Italie. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloth or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

Hen Mago, the sonne of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canne; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the ioyfull message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls hee had chased, wounded, or slaine; how the stout Romans, that in the former warre neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the onely good Captaine, because he neuer durst adventure to come to battaile; That, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slaine of them about two hundred thousand, and taken about fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among therest hee magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not onely (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe seate of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had bin entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warre, Hee said it was euen at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not giue the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrey; that so many battailes had much diminished his brothers Armie: that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberal rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must be sent from Carthage: which the victory would require with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slaine, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels, or (as others would rather haue it) no more then one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatness of the Roman calamity, for as much as none but the "principall of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament.

Who so considers the former Punicke Warre, may easily finde, that the State of Carthage neuer did receiue, in all the durance thereof, any such hopeful advertisements from their Capitaines abroad. Wherefore it is no maruile, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilce, a Senator aduerser to the faction of Hanno, is said to haue demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome, quies.

Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yeelded vnto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to giue thanks vnto the gods, for this their good successe. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same formall answer, which Linie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti; by a terme proper to the Romans; and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull overthrow receiued at the hands Agathea: yet the summe of his speech appears to haue beene no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a iest of these victories, as is reported; saying, It ill becomed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled forsooth with spoyle, to make request for meate and money. To these caills, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaues, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few ^{a Lin. lib. 22.} siluer studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine conuoy of money and prouisions, going to supply all wants of a great Army in some other Prouince, (as the two Scipios are afterwards said to haue done, when they wanne the campe of Afrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his journey towards Italie;) then might such an obiection more iustly haue beene made, vnto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswasion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to seeke peace, whilst they had so much the better in warre.

What would haue been the issue of this counsaile, if it had been followed, it were not easie to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would haue brooked much indignity, in freeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue bin kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for reuenge of so many shameful ouerthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submissiue behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruine, longer than vntill such time, as Rome was at leisure from ^b all other warres. This Counsaile therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was indeed very pestilent; and serued onely to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Nu- midians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of siluer, should be sent out to Hannibal; and that, besides these, twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, should be leuiued in Spaine; not onely to supply, as need should require, the Armies in that Prouince, but to be transported into Italie.

This great aide, had it bene as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not haue found cause, to taxe the recklesse improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Canna to Rome, or in refreshing his Army among ^b the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would haue finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous aduenture; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campes, would haue been commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following Warre. But either the too much carelesnesse of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreame necessity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working vpon the priuate humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commodity, than sense of the publike neede; vicerly peruerued, and made vprofitable in the performance, the order that had bene so well set downe. The ^b Elephants were sent: and some money peraduenture; vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of threescore thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italie, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of warre. Onely some small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine; and the journey of Afrubal thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Heere we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by the Tributes received from their subiects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the Warre of the Mercenaries; and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest needfull twelue hundred talents; had exceedingly impouerished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the losse at Agathea. Yet wee see, what great Armies of Nu- midians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foote, are appointed to the service in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of money in these chargeable vndertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, hauing three or foure yeeres together bene forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in means to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, euen from Tyrus their Mother-Citie in the bottom of the streights vnto the great Ocean; above the Romans: who liued on the fruites of their ground; and receiued their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman fallshood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith; discovered plainly whence the iaculose was bred, that this mighty Citie would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, hauing giuen vp hostages, euen before the Roman Army did set forth, to performe whatsoeuer should be enioyned them, with condition that their Citie might not bee destroyed; and hauing accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded vp all their weapons, and engines of Warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Towne must needs be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelue miles distant from the Sea. For (saide the Romans) this Trade of Merchandize, by which yee now liue, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conseruation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glossing words, plainly shewes, what good obseruation the elder Cato had made of the halty growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, he added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroyed. Hee may seeme, not onely to haue had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the Citie, but much more vnto these times, and the great height wherunto it rose, euen suddenly as wee see, out of many calamities, whilst the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare so terrible a Warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: hauing euerie one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne priuate benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly, was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade couetous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Prouince was secured, they might send an Army into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who hauing once (if they could so do) finished the warre, might easily make ^a Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that he had giuen them to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne slacknesse, incredulity, dulnes, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disbursements in Spaine, than to set vp all their rest at once in Italie. Yet was it indeed impossible, to hold a Countrey of so large extent, and to open a coast as that of Spaine, free from all incursion of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturalls being (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had bene to make a running Warre, by ^a King Liv. 421.

Of such ambition Hanno directly accused Hannibal saying that he made warre what so hee might liue compassed with Legions, as knowing no other way to make himselfe a King. Liv. 421.

which the Romans might have been found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their maine intendment against Rome it selfe, untill such time as euery little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Prouince, then must Emporie have been besieged and forced: which by reason of alliance with the Masilians, gave vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the towne of Emporie was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians, hauing not about foure hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Gracians, though notouer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this towne of Emporie, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Masilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would have beene a worke of little lesse difficulty, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had beene in effect none other, than to alter the state of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better iudgement, neere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to bee forborne; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans vtely out of Spain: whom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For euen for the Romans afterwards remooued Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeouored to change the state of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spain. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in trauaile for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barbines had bin somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were farre lesse honourable than the people of Rome: not onely in gouernment of their subiect Prouinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike about their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony vsed toward their owne Mercenaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will makethem complaine, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Canna; when gladly they would giue all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into Spain.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it selfe, depended wholly, or at least for the most part, vpon the successe of things in Italie; the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Linie, the tender loue of his owne Country, which made him giue credit vnto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his sake, beleue those lies, which the vnpartiall iudgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntuth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being euen broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves vnto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set downe by Amilius Probus, That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any warre. These words, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouer liberrall. For in the treaty of peace betwene Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes, and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise hee would not talke of any compollition:

Amilcar

Amilcar boldly bad him chuse, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the Armes, which his Country had put into his hands to vse against his Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custome vpon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar haue his will, and not to stand with him vpon point of honour; whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plain enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who sheweth, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntuth: saying, that howsoeuer Amilcar, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behaued themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betwene Fabius (as also perhaps betwene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoeuer Linie immoderately Hanno in one place, ioyning very foolishly his owne shamefull ouerbrow at the Islands, Agates, with the great seruices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had alike merit; yet elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage were neuer better, than a little before the losse of their Fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stampe, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Linie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations: which are such as follow.

6. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italie.

HATH bin shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Gaul into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with foureteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horse, had been allotted vnto the Consul, therewith to make warre in Spain against Hannibal: who since he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio beleued, that a good part of these his owne forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carry some of the number backe with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remained in Italie all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spain by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Affairs of these two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat marvellous. For they continually preuailed in Spain, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, and with-drew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates, that we haue cause to wonder, how the enemy could so often find means to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily winne vnto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serue to arme the Naturals against these Inuaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted vnto the Romans, were it onely by the memory of such ill successe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may bee added the Carthaginian Treasure: which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poor, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wares; or seruing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if wee durst be bold to say it, the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great as they are set out by Linie. This we may be bold to say, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Linie in his person, maketh an obiection, vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Linie for him, doth doth answer, That if Ardubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italy. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That Ardubal being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battaile, saue onely by the deepe descent of Rocks, ouer a great Riuer that lay at his backe, ranne away with all his money, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly to wards the Pyrenes, and to forward Italy; vpon which he fell with more then threthou thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retreat, if hee should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as nor intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so haue they said to haue done in the last battaile between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Campe. Wherefore we can no more then be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this Warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being vicerly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisdome to giue too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio in Spain; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporie, an Haven towne, not farre within the Pyrenes, retaining still the same name with little infection. That by the same of his clemency, hee 20 allured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could easily beleeeue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vie his clemency, or he to giue such famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and hauing no iurisdiction in the Country. Yet it is certaine, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better successe, for that he seemed to haue none other end, than setting them at liberty. This pretext auailed with some: others were to be hired with money; and some hee compelled to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when hee had wonne a battaile against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, like ly it is that he remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances 30 neuer forgate, vntill in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maiestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conseruet, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) vphold the Maiesie of the people of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome; yet implied it indee an oblique couenant of subiection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became dittons Romanes; of the Romane iurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Burgundians; Hannibal had found, at his coming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion 40 would make them flatter from the Carthaginians. Wherefore hee not onely appointed Hanno Gouverneur ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Prouince betweene Iberus and the Pyrenes, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke hee gaue the Principality of their Country vnto Hanno and his Heires,) Hee made him not onely Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of Warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferior Officers of their owne, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the coming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indifferently into the protection of others, than many 50 times proue worse then the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanais, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turnes of the Spaniards, and French; as more sensible still of the present euill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, when into they ranne by seeking to auoide it. This bad affliction of his Prouince, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Prouince. Therefore he aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein hee was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Towne hard by, and wonne it.

it. But Ardubal hauing passed Iberus, and coming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found carelesse, as after a victory, rousing abroad in the Country; and with great slaughter draue them aboard their ships. This done, hee ranne vp into the Country, where he withdrew the Ilergetes from the Roman parties, though they had giuen Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his Fleet: where hauing set things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Ardubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Ilergetes were compelled by force, hauing lost Athanasia their chiefe 10 Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Ausserani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would haue made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of siluer. During the siege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thousand of their Company dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should without any cause remembered, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that 20 all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntarily dittons Romanes, subiect vnto Rome, should in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold Warre against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleeeue, that Ardubal, as it were by a charme, stirred vp the Ilergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilst himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Country, was beaten by Ardubal backe to his ships, whence he durst not stirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Prouince, leauing some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wonne, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for, through a deepe snow. As for the Lacetani, Ilergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they fought their owne benefite: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and con- 30 trariwise, vpon sense of injuries receiued, or apprehension of more grieuous tyranny, vnder which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, harkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Country Lawes, and not vnder Gouernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: euen from hencefoorth vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar; till when they were neuer thoroughly conquered.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie against the Carthaginians in fight 40 at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of them being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too farre on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victory, aboue one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates, in Spain, are said to haue submitted themselves vnto the Romans, or giuen Hostages: whereby Ardubal was compelled to flee into the vmoost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Lucitania. Yet it follows; that the Ilergetes did againe rebell; that Ardubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though hauing easily vanquished the Ilergetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred vp against him the Celiberians, that lately were become his subiects, and had giuen him Hostages. These 50 tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battails; wherein they slue fifteen thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand Prisoners. Then returned P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren jointly administered the businesse in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celiberian Warre, the two Scipios did hand 60 conuenter, without both feare or doubt, p'sse ouer Iberus and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and among many others, the same Celiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Ardubal.

Asdrubal. Bellar, the Gouverneur of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselfe to be persuaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the onely way to get the fauour and hearty good will of the Countrey, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages; as resting, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generals: persuading them, as he had done Bellar, to make the Liberality their owne. Hereby the Romans purchased much loue, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we finde, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can beleue few. But since we finde no better certainties, we must content our selues with these.

The yeere following was like vnto this: Asdrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's diuide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and enticery, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and fise hundred horse, out of Africk: He repairs his Fleet, and provides euery way to make resistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, reuolt vnto the Romans: because they had been chidden the last yeere for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navy. The reuolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-lad people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. These doe much mischief, for Asdrubal is faine to make a journey to them. His sudden comming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assaile him, that they drue him, for very feare, to encampe himselfe strongly on an high peece of ground; whence hee darcs not come forth to giue them battaile. So they take Towne by force, wherein hee had laid vp all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Countrey round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should leade his Army forth into Italy: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had bene informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had to weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we finde it reported: and that vpon the very rumour of this his journey, almost all Spain was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal, therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so: or, if they will needs haue it so, that then they must send him a Succesor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to employ they should finde worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moued with this excuse: Asdrubal must needs be gone; Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that seruice both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of money, that he might haue wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gauls; through whole Countries he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembering to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he layes great Impositions vpon all the Spaniards his subiects: and hauing gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are careful how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Riuers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are slaine: and few should haue escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were fully ioyned. Their Campe to the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (Questionlesse) they are maruellously enriched; all the money that could be racked together in Spain, being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes current ioynes all Spain to the Romans, if any part of the Countrey stood in doubt before, and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertisement is sent to Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they haue neither money, apparell, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting: so as ylesse they may be supplied from Rome,

Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an euill season, the State being scarcely able, after the losse at Canna, to helpe it selfe at home. Yet reliefe is sent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that loue and care, which the priuate Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted else-where, into the relation of things whereof the truth is lesse questionable. At the comming of this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we see, that remember the last newes of him, and how fearefully he mistrusted his owne fatcric? They find him, and Mago, and Amilcar the sonne of Bomilcar, with an Army of threecore thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Orelus, and others, probably coniecture to haue stood, where Carinena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgi, afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Illerges their neereft Neighbour, for hauing reuolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of victualles. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the Enemies Campes, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and hauing victualled the place, encourage the towne-men to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon beholde them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. So they issue forth, about fixteene thousand against three core thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, drue all the three Carthaginian Commanders, euery one out of his quarter; and tooke that day, besides prisoners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Ensignes.

The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Iacibili, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of eaming money by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondered, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driuen to poll the Countrey, wanting money of his owne; and being beaten in this journey, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his Campe was taken after the battel by Ibera. Howsoeuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Iacibili: where there were of them about threecore thousand slaine, and about three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the peeple of Spain fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus tooke Fabius, Valerius Antius, or some other Historian, to whom Livy gaue credit, conquer all Spain twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories, whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their owne side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are ouerthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great haste ouer the Riuer. At Castrum album, a place in the mid-way betweene new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victualles, being strong and defensible, as intending to make it his seate for a while. But the Countrey round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse haue charged the Romans in their march, and are gone offscare; falling also vpon some stragglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows in march, they haue cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Publ. withdrawes himselfe vnto Montis victoriae: that rising somewhat Eastward from Iacibili, ouerlooketh the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repairs vnto him; & Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, with a full Army, arrives to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus nere incampd together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himselfe to an high peece of ground; where they besiege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Casulo, a great city of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, ioyneth with the Romans; though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the Riuer Betis. Neuertheless the Carthaginians passe ouer Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to win it by famine. We may iustly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Casulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had bene so grievously beaten the yeere before. But thither they goe: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breaks out vpon them the next day, and in two battels kills aboute twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with fise and thirty Ensignes. This victorie (doubtlesse) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than fise thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians bessege Bigarra: but that sieg is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remoue to Manda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio bene wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed; and twelue thousand men, three thousand prisoners taken, and seauen and fifty Ensignes. The Carthaginians flee to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kills not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed euē by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asdrubal: who hauing also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euē alhamed, to leaue Saguntum entrall'd vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred so into this warre. And well may we thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Country once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appeares) to goe their way without it: so as they neede not blush, for hauing so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they wonne Saguntum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour, and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue so disturbed them, if they had bene able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, wee can perceiue none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals iourney; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporia, an Hauē towne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phocaans, kinne to the Masilians, friends to the Romans; They haue easily wonne to their party, lost, recovered, and lost againe, some pettie bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnsettled passions; and now finally they haue won a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleue, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembered, after euery one of which Asdrubal late do wne before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leuie and arriuall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had bene absolute Masters of the field, when they wonne Saguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeere following, in practising onely with the Celiberians the next adioyning people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeeres businesse. Of these Celiberians we heare before, That they haue yielded vnto themselves vnto the Romans; for security of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Whereof it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot

perceiue; vnlesse perhaps in those daies it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Liue followes, to call euery messenger, or straggler, that entered their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the strictest men are chosen, and carried into Italy; there to deale with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne backe into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellowes at home are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next haue to adde to leade them into Italy. Hereof we finde more than probability, when these mercenary Celiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this accessse of strength, diuide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies, who liue not farre off with three Armies. Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, is nextest at hand; euen among the Celiberians, at Antorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago the sonne of Gisco, hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is fise dayes march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Country, saue themselves from being ouer-taken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better souldiers, that is, two parts of the olde Roman Army; leaving the third part, and all the Celiberians, to his brother. He that hath the longer iourney to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lues end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessity. They ioine their forces together; meet with publius Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that he is driven to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches; wherein hee thinks himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masaniassa, Prince of the Masili, Nimidian bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honor of this seruice is ascribed, for that hee becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis a Spanish Prince, is coming with seven thousand and fise hundred of the Saguntines, to ioine with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut vp, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leaving T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, with a small company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Nimidian horse appeare (whom he thought to haue bene ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neyther are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in Reare, that P. Scipio vnertaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requirerh, is stricke through with a lance, and slaine: very few of his Army escaping the lame destinie, through benefit of the dark night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty daies after. At his meeting with Asdrubal the Celiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Country. If Antorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Plutarchus takes it, a Celiberian towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may iustly beleue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazarding their lues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them; and no lesse vnable, without their helpe, either to resist the Enemy, or to ioine with his Brother, maketh a very violent retreat; herein onely differing from plaine flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard vpon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, hauing made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steals from them all by night; but is ouertaken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stonie ground, where grows not so much as a shrubbe, vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes of easie ascent on euery side; which hee takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packe-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palliade. These weake defences the Carthaginians soone reare in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leaue very few of the multitude that sauing themselves, I know not how, within some woods adioyning, escape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to couer them, could breake out, and throwd themselves within woods adioyning, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Romane Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who hauing gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by moitiues, preferre this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, comming vpon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his men, to (fondly weeping when he led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might haue gotten, but that he wicly sounds the retreat: referring the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his aduantage, they returne to their former security; and vterly despising him, let neither Corps du gard, nor Sentinel, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neere. Martius therefore animates his souldiers with lively words; and telsthem, That there is no aduantage more safe, than that which is further theft from suspicion of being vnder-taken. They are soone periwaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of seruice. So he leades them forth by night, and steales vpon the Campe of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast a-sleepe, or very drowzie, Hee enters without resistance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; so that all affrighted, the Carthaginians run head-long one vpon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Campe Martius hath prepossest, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and run away toward the Campe of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay sixe miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley betwene their two campes hee hath bestowd a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in peeeces. But lest perchance any should haue escaped, and giue the alarme before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficulty hee enters; and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, Hee drives head-long into flight, all that can saue themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirtie seauen thousand of the enemies perish in this nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Heereunto Valerius Antias adds, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seuen thousand slaine: and that in another battaile with Asdrubal, there were 40 slaine tenne thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Linie therefore hath elsewhere well obserued, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antias, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whilst Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Linie reporteth as a common tale, not giuing thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Capitaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in such distresse, Hee could cleerely get off from the Enemies, and giue them any parting blow, though it were farre lesse then that which is heere set downe.

Of these occurrences L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good seruice, whatsoeuer it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might iudge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spain: which the better to intimate vnto them, He stiled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued with the tidings than the case required: and therefore tooke such careful order, for supplying their forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies leui'd to serue in that Prouince, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the Citie it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended offended at his presumption in vsurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to haue the souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Prouinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all conuenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about sixe thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and afforded means of lending abroad such a strong supply: other wise, the victories of Martius would ill haue serued, either to keepe footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Army, which was vnder Martius and Fonteius; he found surer tokens of the ouerthrowes receiued, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: who how to reclaim it, would not easily be deuised. Yet Claudius aduanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Austriani, nere enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lepides agra; out of which there was no issue, but onely through a freight, whereon the Roman feared, as his first comming. What should haue tempted any man of vnderstanding to incampe in such a place, I doe not finde: and as little reason can I find in that which folowd. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart forth with out of all Spain, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence dismissed; That he spent many dayes, in entretyning parlee with Claudius about this businesse; That night by night he conuighed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking aduantage of a misty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his Campe empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spain, we shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicitie of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Countrey, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the footmen could hardly creepe out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke misty day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure; so haue bene of farre lesse value. Howsoeuer it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor,ooke it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good desertes, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reuiued in one of the same Family. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the waite into Africa: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrey. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well condition'd: especially he excelled in Temperance, Commodity, Bounty, and other vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, laouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; How he is vied to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must haue bene one of the gods; and, in likelihood Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed with his Mother, entering her Chamber often, & vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than fables, deuised by Historians, who thought thereby to adde vnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not onely to haue surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this ende nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of vnquestionable truth, That when a Proconful was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, nor one of them hauing the heart, to aduenture himselfe in such a desperate seruice; and finally, That this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twenty yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where he might be seene of all the multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: & either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captaines, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spaine Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euene now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insillt.

P. Scipio was sent Proconful into Spaine; and with him was ioyned M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadiutor. They carried with them tenne thousand foote, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon along the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province: which he entertained with such a maistie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could giue any reason of it. If we must beleue this, then must we needs beleue, that their feare was euene as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeere) hee did no thing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wonne it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discovered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walles; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, remembred the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpon a demi-land, betweene an Hauene and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the wals, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had founded; and finding some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading vp to the Nauill, Scipio thrust therinto some Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the walles without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly vpon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Towne, Luise himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Affrick and Spaine, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adioyning Provinces) whom Scipio entreated with singular courtie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefite. Here vpon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lucetani, neereft Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forooke the Carthaginian party, and ioyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended: for that he did not want himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vse, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in reuoluing from their enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being there-to compelled by iniuries of the enemies; and inuited by the honourable dealing of Scipio.

Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no vnfore token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Scipio; then could nothing haue beene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should haue rather craued pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoeuer the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighboures, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer masters of the Country, till this worthy Commander, by recouering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won vnto himselfe the assured loue & assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this losse, were very sorry: yet neuertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, hauing stolne a Towne by surpris, was too farre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne coniecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth toward Italie; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasion, had done before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage ouer the Lake had been vndiscovered, and the Towne helde out some longer while. For howsoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generality of the businesse, betweene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingering warre of taking and retaking Towne, whilst the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprize: euen to fight in trall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italie: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill-assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming vpon Asdrubal; his Vancourtiers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they draue them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, euen by that small peece of seruice, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the Riuer, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of access on the fore-side; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly incamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, betweene the top and roof of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more vpon brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, than for that he durst aduenture his Army to the hazzard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such aduantage of place could not saue him from the Romans. They climbed vp the Hill to him; they recovered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill-top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long. I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flie. Out of such a battaile, wherein hee had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to haue marched towards the Pyrenes, hauing sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Neuertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to haue consulted with him about this Warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe hee needed must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards, as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue been true, it shal appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. Posthumius the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedon, enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans trying with the Aetolians, make warre upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him: the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

WHEN Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoiced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good newes from Carthage 10 of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence vnto him. In former times he had found worke enough, to carry the Romans come into his owne barnes, and to driue away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, then sustenance for his Army; by making him Master of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue fore'd some walled townes, in like sort as he did Geryon, & the Castle of Canne: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well decided, the hunger, that his Army must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill come were ripe, would haue grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may haue bene the reason, why he forbore to adventure vpon Rome, after his victory at Canne. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the Citie at his first 20 comming; want of victuals would haue compelled him to quit the enterprize. Yet many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would haue taken time of deliberation, & waited perhaps the event of another battaile: if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walles of Rome, he had presented himselfe vnto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to recieue a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto this 30 proud Citie, which so long had held them in subiection. Thus the winter was passed over ioyfully, sauing that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arriued no more, than onely the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had about thirty of them; whereas all, though one, that he brought ouer the Alpes, had bene lost in his iourney through the Marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps inform him, that it was 40 thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as he himselfe had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the iourney, than to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to recieue the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere serued, He tooke the field: and hauing finished what rested to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good haucn-towne thereabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian Fleet; or take 50 with his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To so the same purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilco vnto the Locris, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assily all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicily and Sardinia; since the siege of Rome, must needs be deferred vnto another yeere. Hanno made an ill iourney of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue about two thousand of his men; with the losse of few, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petellia or Petilia by force; after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Consentia; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the Citie of Locri, which 725 was of great importance, yeelded vnto him: as did all other places thereabout; except onely the Towne of Rhegium, ouer against Sicily.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good government, vnder which the Roman subiects liued. As for the Samnites, Campanians, and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrary; wee are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers receiued answer from the Senate, That the publicke misfortunes had not 10 left meanes, to relieue their Associates that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman subiection, that had a private iurisdiction within themselves) fell downe to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to giue them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoeuer was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and hauing thoroughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to giue any relief. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens 20 prouide hereafter for their owne safety, as hauing already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths: and hauing striven in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility, gave to the Carthaginians a bloudie victorie ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assaults.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremity. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their losse at Canne, they had shewed their high minds; by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them so neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better then at home. L. Posthumius Albinus, their Prætor they had sent, with an Armie of five and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King Pinus, they had sent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if he desired 30 forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that hee should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Phariis, their Subiect and Rebelle, whom he had receiued. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius with all his Armie was cut in picces by the Gauls; in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his comming, the Enemies had 40 felled the Trees so far, that a little force would serue to cast them downe. When therefore Posthumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gauls, that lay about the Wood, began to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were ouerwhelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious worke of sawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might haue blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the deuice was subiect; I do not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may haue bene done: and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the sauage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countie now so ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumius his skull, being cleansed, and trimmed 50 up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessel, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no lesse then the calamitie. But sorrow could giue no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted force to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither do I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdædictus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few yeeres following, the Romans dealt vpon euen termes; entreating their assistance against Philip and Persus; not commanding their dutie, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For 725

having assured his affaires in Greece, and enjoying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, He sent Embassadors to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, vpon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman warre, vntill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoile therein to be gotten, should be left entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, vntill hee had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leauing flemably vnto him the full possession of that country, and the Isles adioyning. But such predisposition of Kingdoms and Provinces, is lightly controlled by the diuine Providence, which therein shewes to it selfe not (as Herodotus falsely termes it, and like an Archeist) enuious or malicious, but very iust and majesticall; in vp-holding that vnspcakable greatnesse of Souerainty, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadors that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: & being examined what they were, aduentured vpon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessitie. These newes were so welcome, that the ioy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquiry. So they were louingly fasted, and freely dismissed with guides that should leade them the way, and shew them how to auoyde the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their iourney, fell wilfully into the Campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the businesse; about which they came, vpon the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe vnluckily to be desired by the Roman fleet; which, mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gaue them chase. They did their best to haue escaped: but being ouer-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboard; and trusting to the lie that once had serued them, said it againe, That hauing bene sent from King Philip, to make a league with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthaginians lying betwene, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Pretor, vnto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now lesse credible than before: and (which mured all) Gisco, Bellar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquisition serued to find all out: so that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole businesse confessed. The Embassadors and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before, onely with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heauy weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them, when their shoulders were ouer-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and futable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would haue beate vpon them from Spain. They iudged it more easie, with small forces to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, ioyning with Hannibal in such a time, would haue sufficed to shake the allegiance, not onely of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subjects, but euen of the Roman Colonies that held all priuiledges of the Citie, it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twenty Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend vpon the Macedonian, and so to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begunne. Philip was busied about the Sea townes, that looked towards Italy, setting vpon Apollonia; and thence sailing vpon Oricum, which he wonne, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epirots craued helpe of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kind offers, who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Towne-men in good order; but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspicion. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand thousand men, vnder Nauius Crispus, an vnder-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable fallie, and brake into Philips Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his campe, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to haue departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the Riuer, so that he was faine to burne his ships, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwayes enemy to the Crowne of Macedon: and easily perswaded them (being so affected, as hath else where bene shewd) to make strong warre on Philip; wher in he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and wherof the Roman was as liberall in making promise, as if already it had bene his owne. So a league was made betwene them: and afterward solemnly published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Coreyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrey should be subdued, and left vnto the Ætolians, the pillage onely to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Prouision, to hold no longer than whilst he abstained from doing iniurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeed the onely point, wherat Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Romans behalfe. That they should not make peace with the Macedonians, unless it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place referred for the Lacedemonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauored the side of Eleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scordiletus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Asia the little, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatie, rather to giue it countenance, than for any readinesse which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Demachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had onely the title of Quarre, was said to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle; when he heard wherunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Armie, made a countenance of warre vpon the Illyrians, & other his borders, that were wont in times of danger to inuade the Kingdom of Macedon; wasted the Countrey about Oricum and Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessalie, whence he made shew as if he would inuade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to stirre vp all the Greeks adioyning, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Countrey. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, He left Persicus, his sonne, and heire, with foure thousand men, vpon their borders: with the rest of his Armie; beate greater businesse should ouer-take and entangle him. He made a long iourney into Thrace, against a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, wheneuer the King was absent. The Ætolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies; and winne their little Countrey, ere he should be able to returne. He wrote it some auailed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniade and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes, conueniently situated to let in an Armie; and consigned them vnto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) every Mothers sonne of them, in defence of their Countrey; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who layd aside all other businesse) to succour those his friends; caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprise. When this Expedition was giuen ouer, the Romans and Ætolians fell vpon Ancyra, which they tooke: the Romans assailing it by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Towne, and the Romans the spoile.

For these good seruices M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius sent in his stead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Attalus one of Asia came ouer to assist the Ætolians. Hee was chiefly moued by his owne lealousie house of Philips greames: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity, of being chosen by the Aetolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titular, he tooke in very loving part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being ioynd with the maine power of Aetolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome neighbours desired peace of him, and wised their best meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadors, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intolerable conditions, as ill becomed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare: of being besieged in their owne Townes, that had made to them desirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatened Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the streight from Narpaceus, wasted the Country in a terrible brauerie: wherein Philip requited them, coming vpon them in great haste from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heate of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip; sent a Naue into Greece, to assist the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reason, as to being more interested in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vnto the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fastning vpon any part of Greece; than afterward it could serue to drine them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that hee should correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Towne, He was encountered by the Aetolian and Roman garrison, which draue him backe with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conuersion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had receiued no great detrimēt, in his retreat from Elis: rather he had giuen testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also sone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentie thousand head of Cattle, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily vnder a lowe tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered vp by an Aetolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horse was well knowne, and the tale beleefed. All Macedon therefore was in an vpror: and not onely the Borderers, ready to fall vpon the Country, but some Captaines of Philip, easily corrupted, who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achaens. He also tooke order, to haue Beacons erected; that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom he meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-faouoredly: especially in the Ile of Euboea, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arriue to helpe it, where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue beene lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus. This Citie, lying ouer against Euboea, Attalus had worne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vsed. Now because the Roman souldiers had defrauded him in the sacke of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilst he was busie, in drawing as much mony as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philips arriuall, made him leaue all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships; finding the Romans gone gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignity of this misaduenture; or tidings of Prusias the Bithynian his inuasion vpon the kingdom of Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leaue of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus; worne Tarone, Tritonus, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Aetolians. In the meane season, Machanidas, the tyrant of Lacedemon, had bene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arriuall, was retained home.

The Lacedemonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Aegypt, went about to choise two new Kings, and to conforme themselves to their old manner of government. But their Estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proued no lesse vnfortunate, than had bene their attempts of recouering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant rose vp among them: vnto whom succeeded this Machanidas, & shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Aetolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achaens, that were the chief Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrants, and Lacedemonians. But of these we shall speake more hereafter.

Philip coming into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Country; spake braue words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them, such haste they made, for feare of being overtaken. But flight, hee said, was not alwayes prosperous: hee should one day light vpon them; as ere this he sundry times had done, and still to their losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee restored vnto their Nation some Townes that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymeans, that had bene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he sought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, hee fell vpon the Aetolians: whom he draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds; and wasted their Country. This done, he tooke leaue of the Achaens: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subiects, or dependents: and animated them so well, that they rested fearlesse of any threatening danger. Then had he leisure to make warre vpon the Dardaniens, his neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuertheless he was not so far occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred gallies, whereby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldned him to make strong warre vpon the Aetolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans, either some displeasure, conceiued against their Confederates, or some feare of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall vpon Italy; caused them to giue over the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Aetolians therefore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirte fixe gallies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Aetolia, he turned aside to Dyrrachium, & Apollonia, making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battell, but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himselfe close within the walls of Apollonia, making some Querrels of peace: which caused Philip returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Aetolians, as had Philip, to take in euil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royall offer that he made them, to serue their turne in Italy, and assist them, in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought; and as (considering his want of sufficient ability by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Atolian Pyracies. Onely once they came to his help, which was, at his last journey into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arrivall: having done nothing, and pretending feare of being taken by the Romans, euen at such time as Philip, with his owne Naue, durst boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This rechelesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to haue bene one of Hanno his trickes, wherof Hannibal too bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this malicious man exceedingly, to heare that so great a King made off: to serue in person vnder Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Enue could suggest, to periwade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thrifte course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres so mightie a Prince, whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to sue charges: and feede the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing; yet would it fruite to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemy worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once hee was engaged in the warre, be vrged vnto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of giuing him thanks. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the deuotion of Carthage: better it were that the Citie should be free, so as the trouble some Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betwene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Affricke, should wait vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such iniuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition, without his aduice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in their little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he beganne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would haue reached, had hee not vainely giuen credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Atolians had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to haue succoured them in their necessitie, hee might giue ouer the warre, and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselves. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were merely his owne, and he vnable to manage it.

The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recovered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian, and therefore perhaps inserted into the counsants, that somewhat might seeme to haue bene gotten. On the other side, the Auntanes were appoynted to retaine vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably coniectures) the people of the Countrey about Apolonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings, wherby it appears, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Phryias King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Boeotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the people of Num, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the tyrant of Lacedaemon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and and Athenians. The Atolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Atolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also infected by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much vpon their old honour, and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the setting downe of their names in this Treatie, serued the Romans to good purpose: inasmuch as they were a busie people, and mislaid occasion to renew the warre, when means did better serue to follow it.

How the Romans beganne to reconce their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieuing the publike necessities of their Common-weale.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues: and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would haue serued (if good order had bene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the lesse harmful, if their care of Italy had bene such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeere to yeere, cauled as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could haue desired. The death of Posthumus, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaulle, the begunne rebellion of the Sardinians, the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse, with great alterations, much to their preiudice, in the whole Isle of Sicill; as also that warre, of which we last spake, threatened from Macedon, happening all at one time; and that so neerely after their terrible overthrow at Canna, among so many reuolts of their Italian Confederates; would verily haue funke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeere, yet at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuersitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administered matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, wherupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their fuercall Armies. This had not bene a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had bene thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should haue bene strengthened; whatsoeuer had become of the rest. But the slender troups, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spain; the lingring aide which they sent, to vphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-neere beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their halie catching at Sicill: little deferred to bee thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather eury one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no otherwise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italy, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal, then must hee patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were enuious of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoeuer he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessity; so to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to wile away the time about Nola, Naples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to be reserued for a worke of more importance. Many offers be made vpon Nola, but alwayes with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; hauing the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal lost in that fight: which was no great mischance; his forces being then diuided, and employed in sundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was, euen in those dayes, a strong Citie; and required a yeares worke to haue taken it by force.

Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the towne of Cuma they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campani) to be present at a solenne sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made them to entertaine; but priuily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should haue bene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being iudged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they faigned so to haue done, because this was the first time, that cuertwo Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of Religion, or Superstition: where with Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campani: not able to meet the Enemy in field; yet intente to alloccasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had bene armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, he continually trained: and had nota greater care, to make his Armie skillfull in the exercises of warre, than to keepe it from quarrels, that might arise by vpbraiding one another with their base conditions.

Whilest the Consul was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cume sent him word of all that had passed betwene them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himselfe into Cuma: whence hee issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campani. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hima; three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Albius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with foureene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deuising how to surpise others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meate and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights seruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; loosing not about an hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but carried not long to rife it, for feare of Hannibal, who lay not farre off. By this his providence, he escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hima, forth with he marched thither: hoping to find those young souldiers, and slaues, busied in making pile, and loading themselves with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma, which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill success, the Carthaginians and their fellows spent, about this towne. They raised a wooden Tower against it; which they brought close vnto the walls; thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an high Tower: whence they made resistance; and found means at length, to consume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busied in quenching the fire; the Romans, sallying out of the towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and drave 50 them to their trenches, with the slaughter of about foureene hundred. The Consul wisely sounded the Retreat; ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to require their seruice. Neither would he, in the pride of this good success, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battell the day following, neere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the siege; and returned to his old campe at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after; when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small townes were recovered by the Romans, & the people severely punished for their revolt.

The

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yielded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it selfe, was driven in the meane time to alter his course of warre: and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a generall inuasion vpon the whole Countrey, to passe from place to place, and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samnites was grievously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and receiued there the losse before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalte, to get the Soueraigntie. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they ouer-burdened their new Lords, and gaue vnto their old, the more easie means, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intente, as necessity constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and ioyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appoynted vnto that honour the yeere before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, That being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand vpon nice points of formality: or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus, knowing in what need the Citie stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, serued to put the Campani in feare, that Capua it selfe should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earnest entreatie came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, hauing with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The garrison in Puteoli was sixe thousand strong: and did their dutie so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good success, could onely shew his angervpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill success as before) assayed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilest hee was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a journey against Beneuentum: and T. Gracchus the last yeeres Consul, halting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell, Hanno had with him about seuentene thousand foot, Brutians and Lucans for the most part: besides twelue hundred horse; very few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moorers. Hee held the Roman worke foure houres, ere it could be perceiued, to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late armed slaues, had receiued from their Generall a peremptory denunciation; That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their liberty, bringing euery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The Lucans reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the slaue enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the seruice, by imployment of so many hands, in a worke so litle concerning the victorie. Gracchus therefore finding his owne error, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should haue libertie immediately after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them turne headlong vpon the Enemy; whom their desperate furie had soone ouerthrowne; if the Roman Horse could haue made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard vpon the Romans battell, that foure thousand of the slaues, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatened before the battell, vnto those that should not valiantly beate themselves retired vnto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to saue himselfe by flight, when the Grosse of his Army was broken; being vnable to remedy the losse. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were Horse; all the rest were either slaue or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his souldiers that reward of libertie which he had promised: but vnto those foure thousand, which had recoiled

vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they scrud in the wars, they should neither eate nor drink otherwise than standing. vnlesse sicknesse forced them to breake his order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beuenturum; where the newly enfranchised souldiers were feasted in publique by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, and all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of slaues manumitted) with Caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie, which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italie: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hama, being things of so small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to help it. The Fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which all they could worke doe than before, as liuing vpon the same trade, and subiect to the same inconveniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicily and Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Prouinces, to holde them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, euery one of them suffered his part of the detriment; which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnesse of the warre within the bowels of Italie, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicily and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians; and of many among the Naturalls declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Easterne parts of Italie; if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home, the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spain; and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driuen almost euen to extreme want of counsell. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolu'd vpon the onely course, without the which the Citie could not haue subsisted.

They called the people to Assembly: wherein Quintus Fuluius the Pretor laide open the publique warres; and plainly sayd, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers; but that such as had stiffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loans of their commodities, and labours vntill the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had liued vpon their dealing in the common Reuenues, that the charge was vnder-taken by priuate men; and the Armie in Spain as well supplied, as the Treasurie had bene full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publius Enrius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intenued to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselves in this present warre. They beganne with L. Caelius Metellus; who, after the battell at Canna, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had bene no better than lost. After him they tooke in so hand those, that hauing brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna; returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his Campes; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; euen whosoever had not scrued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed. Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had vied to be) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added therunto, by this Decree of the Senate

Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should be transported into Sicily; there to serue vntill the end of the warre, vnder the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canna. The office of the Censors was; to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to chooſe or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vnhoonest or vnseemly behaviour fell not within the compasse of the Law. They tooke also an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publique Horties of seruice, vnto such as they thought meete; or tooke them away for their misbehaviour. Generally, they had the ouer-sight of mens liues and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and feared, though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rancke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasurie, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Morallitie, they had the charge of all publique Workes; as mending of High-ways, Bridges, and Water-courses, the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man encroched vpon the streetes, High-ways, or other places thought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publique Reuenues, to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office, as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserve the dignitie of the Senate: the commonaltie being obnoxious vnto the Censors, which were alwayes of that Order, and careful to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impouerished by warre, and hauing small store of lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generosities of the Romans. They that had bene accustomed, in more happy times, to vnder-take such peeces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had bene no such want: promising liberally their cost and trauell, with out expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaues, that lately had bene enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forebeare the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better cieto pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as euen one was able, the common necessitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widdowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Questor kept a Booke of all that was layed out for the sustentance of these Widdowes and Orphans: whilst the whole stocke was vsed by the Citie. This good example of the which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Countrey was in so great want.

The twelue hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yielded halfe so much commoditie, as might be layed in ballance against these miseries, wherein their Estate was now reduced. Neuerthelesse, if wee consider things aright; the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom shee forthwith vnder-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto shee attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names wee haue already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman vertall grew more hard and solide: and by paring the branches of priuate fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to ashes; and taken from euery particular Citizen, all hope of other richitie, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the vniuersallitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath iudiciously obserued) That a State, whose dimension or steme is small, may aptly serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to passe, where all regard of domesticall prosperitie is laid aside, and euery mans care addressed to the benefit of his Countrey. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath seen a great example, in the vniued Prouinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Townes, or almost of their Families, perceiued it selfe to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alus; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme industrie, and straining themselves to fill their publike Treasurie, they are all growne wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their seruices by Land. Wherefore if we valew at such a rate as wee ought, the patient resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and aboue all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: wee may truly say, That the Cittie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, should in all reason haue bene more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and caried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subiects of Rome could haue beleeued their owne interest to be as great, in those warres which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded vpon so great vertue, could not haue bene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer so many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though he hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subiect vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIII.

The Romans winne some Townes backe from Hannibal. Hannibal winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the People of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the warre: so their Generalls abroad omitted no part of industrie, in seeking to recouer what had bene lost. The towne of Casiline Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garrison; and likely to haue bene relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Neuertheless the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to giue it ouer: saying, that the enterprise was not great, yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. Hee said, That many such things, as were not at first to haue bene vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted vnto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the towne was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craued parlee; offering to giue it vp, so as all might haue leaue to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they werethus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is duerly reported) Marcellus seizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul: who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deferred commendations, by holding his word good vnto these fiftie; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as escaped the heare of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some equiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like fort was Mount Marsian in Gafoigne taken by the Marshall Menius, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their feuerall guards, vpon hastie desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discovering a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all saue the Governour vnto the sword. Herein that Governour of Mount Marsian committed two grosse errors; the one, in that hee gaue no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for assurance giuen and receiued. Some such ouer-sight, the Governour of Casiline seemeth to haue committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Menius, was very honourable.

table. When this Worke was ended, many small townes of the Samnites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recouered: wherein were taken, or slaine, about fise and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrey grievously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sick at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promised to giue vp the towne. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thrust so many men into it, that the traitours durst not flie. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart, having wearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrey, but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So hee departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintering place; and beganne to victuall it, when Summer was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne, in which regard if he beganne his winter more timely, than otherwise he required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessity enforced, to make their Summer last as long, as they were able to trauell vp and downe the Countrey.

About this time beganne great troubles in Sicill, whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Province, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publike seruice, to imploy often-times their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meete him: eleven of the twelue Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of duerence, to passe by them on horse-backe, which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiving this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note in who they should bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feet. The father cheerefully did so; saying, It was my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest understand thy selfe to be Consul. Cassius Albinus a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Cannae, had holpen the Carthaginian into that towne, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came priuily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it backe vnto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Albinus a pattern to all traitors; vsing him, as Camillus and Fabriceius had done those, that offered their vnfaithfull seruice against the Falisci, and King Pyrrius. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and sayd, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee should be sent to the towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; until they could better resolve what to doe with him, or whatyle to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Albinus was gone, and among the Romans, took it not for sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great: Yet, that hee might seeme rather seuerer, than couetous, he sent for the wife and children of Albinus into his camp: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the treason, to be burnt alive; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which hee tooke by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. Fise thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. They were thrust most by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was vnderstood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the towne-men suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdome, to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: protesting, that they had bene betrayed by their Princes; and were become subiect to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In proceffe of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Consul: and receiving his faith for security of the Towne, presently presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is, that Hannibal men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and serue on the Roman side, it was yet couenanted, that the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman againe, with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time, Cliternius was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cneus Fuluius; another of the Pretors, an hundred & twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their seruice, vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods restored vnto them, when their citie should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campanians toward Rome, it serued to discouer the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had bene promised from Carthage. The Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yielded themselves to Hannibal, returned againe to their olde allegiance. Others would haue followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himselfe a Capitaine, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in forraging the Countrey, was slaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, to which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere hee could bring his desire to passe: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligences, He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassadour, praesiding with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conueighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his company were the next day so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought backe to Rome, where they suffered death as traitors. By reason of this cruelty, or leuitie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discouered. Wherefore they sent againe to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, vied much to goe forth of the towne on hunting by night, as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not seeme to haue bene abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three dayes iourney to Tarentum, if he should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place, to the lesse to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure. Hee caused it to be giuen out, that he was sicke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne carelesse of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their businesse in order, He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot, and long before breake of day, made all speed thitherward. Foure score light horse of the Numidians ranne a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be discouered. It had bene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged, and gaue order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night, Hannibal guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arriuall, Nico, that was within the towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was ready. Presently Nico beganne to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called vp the Porter, bidding him make haste, for that he had killed a great Bore, so heauy, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket, and forthwith forthwith entered two young men, laden with the Boare, which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood forth wondering at the largenesse of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Boare-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when hee had slaine, he entered the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entering Tarentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the citie, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the towne was in an uproare: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnskillfully sounded by a Greeke in the Theater: which helped the suspicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoyle the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boate, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Hauen; whence hee might easily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vnderstand, what good affection hee bore them; inueighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else hee thought fit for the present. This done: and hauing gotten such spoile as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, hee addressed himselfe against the Citadell, hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, hee might giue them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Pecee. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when hee beganne to make his approaches, the Romans in a brauene falling forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell backe of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so fare from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gaue Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely setting vpon the Enemy, draue him backe with great laughter, as if as hee could runne; so that afterwards hee durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood vpon a Demi-land, that was plaine ground; and fortified onely with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was ioyned by a cawsey. This cawsey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keepe themselves from all danger thence. His worke in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that hee conceived hope of winning the Pecee it selfe, by taking a litle more paines. Wherefore hee made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was busied in his workes, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of preuailling, & made him returne to his former counsaile. Now so much as the Tarentine fleet lay within the hauen, and could not passe forth, whilest the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea: whilest the Roman garrison, by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconuenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the hauens; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streetes being faire and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer Land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This hee vnderooke, and effected: whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires required.

Thus with mutuall losse on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fuluius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twentie Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hastic growth from that want of men, and of all necessities, whereinto the losse at Caune had reduced them. But to fill vp these Legions, they refraine to take vp young Boyes, that were vnder seuentene yeeres of age: and to send Commissioners about fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare seruicable, and pressing them to the wars; making yet a Law, that their yeeres of seruice, whereinto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had bene of lawfull age.

Before the Roman Armie drew neere, the Campani felt great want of victuall, as if they had already beene besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyle, which the Romans had in fore-going yeeres made vpon their grounds. They felt therefore Embassadors to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to be shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable words: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be ready with all maner of carriages, to store themselves with victualls, that hee would provide. Neither did he promise more than hee performed. For he caused great quantitie of graine, that had beene layd vp in Cities round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Benecuntum. Thither at the time to appoynted came no more than fortie Carters or Wagons, with a few packe-horses, as if this had beene enough to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlesnesse of the Campani. Hanno was exceeding angrie herat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not teach them to haue greater care. Wherefore he gaue them a longer day; against which he made promise to store them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Benecuntum. Therefore Q. Fuluius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needfull for the seruise, came into Benecuntum by night; where with diligence hee made inquirie into the behaviour of the Enemy. Hee learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great haruest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves to assaile the Enemies campe: and leauing all his impediments within Benecuntum, hee marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnexpected, hee had well-nere forced the Campe on the sudden. But it was very strong and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued; the lesse desire had Fuluius to lose more of his men in the attempts; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore hee layd, that it were better to goe more leisuely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of their Armie; and to lie betwene Hanno and home; that neither the Campani should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieue them. Being thus discouraging, and about to sound the retreat; hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart. There was great boiste, or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vntill they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Fear of such ignominy, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers aduenture so desperately; that Fuluius, perceiving the heat of his men; changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had already gotten ouer the Trenches. This the 40 Campe was wonne: in which were slaine aboue fixe thousand; and taken, aboue ten thousand, besides all the store of victualls, and carriages, with abundance of boorie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the neerer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pitifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that hee was wont to profess vnto their Citie; and how hee had made shew, to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if hee gaue not strong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoile, whilst he himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which hee saw in so many townes adioyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Eastern part of Italy, which was called old Magna Gracia. These people took to hart the death of their hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soone as the Roman garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more ado, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurinus would haue done the like, vpon the like reason, had not some companies laine in their

Towne;

Towne; which they feared that they should not be able to master. Neuerthelesse, they helped themselves by cunning: inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neare at hand: against whom whilst they proffered their seruice to Atinius, the Roman Capitaine, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, closed vp their gates. A little formality they vsed in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should breake in together with the Romans, in sauing Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practise) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginians, or no. But this disposition lasted not long: for they that had remoued the chiefe impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and deliuered vp the towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilst the Consuls fortifying Benecuntum to secure their backs, addrest themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprize. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late bene twice Consul, was slaine; either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Benecuntum, there to secure the backs of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hindrance of that busines. The Volones or Slaves lately manumitted, forsooke their Ensignes, and went every one whither he thought good; as if they had bene discharged by the decaise of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seek them out, and bring them backe into their camp. Neuerthelesse, the Consuls went forward with their worke; and drawing neare to Capua, did all acts of hostility which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome, wherein aboue fiftene hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better; inso much that he caused them to dislodge. They remoued by night, and went severall wayes: Fuluius towards Cannæ, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who hauing led him a great walke, fetcht a compasse about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not farre from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trusted with the leading of fixe thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reiect the vertue of any good Souldier, how meane soener his condition were. Wherefore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand: and he himselfe being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered vp so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, betwene a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. He and his fellowes were all (in a manner) slaine, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fuluius, a Roman Pretor with eigheteen thousand men, was in Apulia, very carelesse, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he hasted, to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when hee should haue cut off those forces, that lay in the Prouinces about, vnder men of small ability. Coming vpon Fuluius, he found him and his men so iolly, that needs they would haue fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battell to Fuluius, hee soone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape aine; leauing all, but two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, received the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neuerthelesse, all care was taken, to gather vp the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls late downe before the towne and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Army from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would issue out of Capua before a certaine day prefixed, should

haue his pardon, and be suffered to enioy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously reiecte; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginian, which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long iourney, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he returned to Brundisium, vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as brauely re-comforted. Hee bade them consider, how a few dayes since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither againe, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get backe into the City, which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe, hee was of opinion, that Capua, being very wel manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time; and thereby giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingered, and thereby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; which he himselfe persued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fulsius, when their terme of office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies as Proconsuls. The towne of men of 20 ren sallied out; rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect: the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Roman horse (for their foote was easily beaten) the Romans vsed to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirnish. In these exercises the Capuans vially had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemy, who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some active and courageous young men, should learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes, leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thicke vpon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartned in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their Campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whol power, in a terrible manner as they could devise: setting all their multitude of vnseruicable people on the walls, which with a loud noyse of Pans and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Capuans, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length backe into their City. Neuertheless, in pursuing them to their gates. He receiued a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Q. Fulsius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian army. The Roman camp was euen at poynt to haue bin lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch and filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Assailants. It is sayd, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine wel, to proclaim aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next hills, forasmuch as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Army, hauing sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched it selfe, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine citadell, had well-neere lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum, were to haue been much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vse: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, to set vpon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud City, the danger of warre that threatened Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one

one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces, then was it likely, that either he, or the Capuans, should wel enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despair, that the terrour of his coming might be sufficient to affright the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His only feare was, lest the Capuans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtle Numidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman Campe, conueighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The iourney to Rome, was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddenesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to haue in a readinesse ten dayes victuals; and prepared as many boates, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the Riuer of Volturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generalls by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate which was therewith affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsell to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather than to put the towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly sayd, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence, if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulsius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behouefull: & if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much aduantage. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulsius took fiftene thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choise of his whole Army: with which he hastned toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not trauele by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua. Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Volturnus, burnt vp all his boates; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or cost him. Then hastned he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than hee needed must. Yet found he the Bridges ouer Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregelle: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grievously to spoyle their lands, whilst the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that hee drew to Rome, the greater waste hee made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pestered with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great market, or place of Assembly; ready to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions giuen by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the middle of this trepidation, there came newes that Quintus Fulsius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hastning to the defence of the city. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his return: home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulsius might lose nothing by comming into the City in time of such neede, an Acte was passed, That hee should haue equall power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one foone after another: Fulsius hauing bene long held occupied in passing ouer Volturnus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Countrey was able to giue. The Consuls and Fulsius, incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew neerer and greater, so tooke they more careful and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he aduanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way vnder the walls, viewing the fire thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driuen away, without doing, or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. About the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (vpon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some ewe hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Colina, wherewith was thought that their seruice might be usefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walkes, lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal, bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproare, among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the walls. The noyse was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of catails, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoining, that the passage was stopp'd vp: and the poore Numidians pitifully beaten from the house toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not bene certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedy the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had bene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should haue authoritie as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and presented battle to the Romans, who did not wilyly if they undertooke it. It is sayd, that a terrible shewre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their severall Campes: and that this happened two dayes together, the weather breaking vp and clearing as soone as they were departed asunder: certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes provision, could not endure to stay there, vntill his victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well aduised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parred (as is sayd) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be giuen to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great soeuer it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped wel, that at the same time, the supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipio's, was sent out of the towne, & went forth at the gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panick terrors, as they are called, where of there is either no cause knowne, or no cause vnferable to the greatnes of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such, as men haue fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his soldiers to disarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they wist not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish uproare in his army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had sent the Ass into the campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appeares withall a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, & augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to haue bene diminished. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that feare, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very peece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had bene in time of peace. This indignity comming to his care, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made sport-sale of the Silver-lineths shoppes, which were neere about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne, were no worse, than any Roman Citizens could be vnto that peece of ground, whereon he raised his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing worth. The Romans did seeke to manifest that assurance, which they iustly had conceiued, Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had propoed vnto himselfe, this iourney had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake vp his Campe: and doing what

poile he could in the Roman Territorie, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest ouer the Countrey, and ranne toward the Easterne Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the Cittie of Rhegium before his arriual was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gaue it lost: and is likely to haue cursed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieue that faire Citie, since hee had no other way to vent his griefe.

Fulsius returning backe to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that whoso would yield, before a certaine day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of Fulsius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, euery mans conscience of his owne euill defaults, told him, that it was a vanitie: and some souldiers hope was giuen, by Hanno and Bostar. Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe, if meanes could onely be found, how to conuey such Letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitiues out of the Towne, into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunitie to make an escape thence with their packes. But it hapned ere they could conueigh themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Towne; and the Letters of Bostar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that hee would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (sayd they) wee came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions wheresoeuer they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armie be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, haue wee gotten those victories at Trabia, Thrasymene, and Canna. In fine, they besought him, that hee would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Cittie should not be taken in his full view: promising to make a desperate fallie, if he would once more aduenture to set vpon the Roman Campe. Such were the hopes of Bostar and his fellowes.

But Hannibal had already done his best: and now beganne to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) hee was vanquished by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had bene sent out by the Hannibals, to obsecure the doings of Hannibal, and to checke his proceedings. If this were so, iustly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessitie. Howloer it were, the Letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitiues, as carried such messages, whipt them backe into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Capuans; so that the multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauet of the Senators, and such as a few yeeres since had bene most forward in ioyning with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough wherunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good chere, he would drinke to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruel reuenge, which the Enemies sought vpon their bodies. About leuen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poison. All the rest hoping for more mercie than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Towne-gates was set open; wherat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe: at their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons vpon them all, and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe custody; some to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the generall multitude, they were referred vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vied by Fulsius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduersity. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexorable to the Capuans; as hauing loued them well in former times, and hauing giuen his daughter in marriage to that Pacuius, of whom we spake before. But this faculty his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance: for feare, left vpon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behoufull to the common safetie, and honour of their State. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theanum, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he stricke off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all townes of Italy the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campan: and bred a generall inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines, & Sabatinus, people of the Campan, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very feare, & want of ability to resist. They were therefore vied with the like rigour, by Fulvius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young Gentlemen, burning with fire of Reuenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire to many houses, that a great part of the city was like to haue bin consumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no calultie. Wherefore libertie was proclaimed vnto any slave, and other sufficient reward to any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. This all came out, and the Campan being detected by a slave of their owne (to whom, about his liberty promised, was giuen about the summe of an hundred marks) had the punishment answerable to 20 their deserts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set vnto their miseries. That which vpon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poore women in Capua (of which one had bene an harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and referred to further deliberation: but the generallitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certayne day, and confined vnto severall places as best liked the angry victors. As for the towne of Capua, it was suffered to 30 stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious site: but no corporation or forme of polities, was allowed to be therein; onely a Roman Proquest was yearly sent to gouerne ouer those that should inhabit it, and to doe iustice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great loss in the present warre. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being farre spent; and that which should haue reuiued his flame, being vnfortunatly shed; as shall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicily, held warre against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

W Hilest things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicily by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end, by the indolent valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: about thirty thousand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arriue thereto suppress it. One Harlicor as with his sonne Hystus, mightie men in that land, were the King-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his Countrey. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprife careless, as in the rest of their maine vndertakings, about the same time. Yet it had bene better, if so their care had bin directed vnto the prosecution of that maine businesse in Italy, whereon this: and all other hopes depended. For it would haue sufficed, if they could haue hindered the Romans from sending an Armie into Sardinia. Harlicor as with his followers might well enough haue serued to drue out Quintus Mutius the Prator, wholy sicke in the Prouince; and not more weak in his owne body, than in his traine. But whilest they sought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the senle was more grievous; they neglected the opportunitie of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of securing themselves from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprife enterprife was such; as may seeme to haue encouraged them from being at the like change, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent ouer Asdrubal, surnamed, the Bald, with a competent fleet and armie, assisted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremity of foule weather, was cast vpon the Baleares: so beaten and in such euill plight, that the Sardinians had euen spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere theif friends could arriue to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelue 10 hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Island, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserve and vp-hold in their severall Prouinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had bene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincials; if any grace were to be obtrayned from the Senate; or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron: the first Conquerour, and his race after him, were the most readie and best approved means, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very fine intelligence, in euery Prouince, and had alwayes in readinesse fit men to reclaime their Subiects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius, retayned in obedience 20 all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harlicor as so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we haue spoken before: hee landed at Calari or Caralis, where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countrey, and sought out the Enemy: Hystus, the sonne of Harlicor as, had then the command of the 30 Sardinian Armie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their side. This young Gentleman would needes adventure to get honour, by giuing battell to the Romans at his owne discretion. So heerashly ventured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom hee receiued a terrible overthrow, 30 and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hystus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeat came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in such hie as hee might haue done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to sue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himselfe backe to Calari: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craued his assistance, their Countrey being 40 wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to ioyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calari: where if hee had stayed a litle longer, Asdrubal would haue sought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appeares to haue bin greater than was their strength. For after some time made of them in a few skirmishes, Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battell; wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies, and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians, three thousand. Foure hours the battell lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had bene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of young Hystus, and of his father 50 Harlicor as, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captivity of Asdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus; whither Manlius followed them, and in short space wonne the Towne: All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yielded vnto the Roman; who imposing vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best suited with the nature of their severall offences, or their ability to pay, returned backe to Calari with a great boote, and from thence to Rome, leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicily was of greater length; and euery way more burdenfome to Rome: as also the victory brought more honour and profit. For that the Romans betune there-by, not onely salers of their owne, as in Sardinia, but Lords of the whole Countrey, by annexing the cite and dominion of Syracuse, so that which they enioyed before. Soone after after the battell of Canna, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a steadfast friend vnto the Romans, and greatly relieved them in this present warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fiftene yeares of age; Gelo his sonne, that should haue bin his heire, being dead before. To this young King his successors, Hiero appoynted fiftene tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius, who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he iudged most likely to preserve the Kingdome, by the same arte, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a litle while, Andronodorus waxing weary of so many coadiutors, began to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeares; and sayd, that he was able to rule the Kingdome without help of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, he caused others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to passe, in a sort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernement, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was onely in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby hee offended the eyes of his people, that had neuer seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behauiour, furable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that in course of life, he would reuiue the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. He grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late tutors as could scape him by flight, were glad to liue in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoyde the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe. Onely Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso continued in grace with him, and were his Counsaillers, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoeuer they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about that maine point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change: but Thraso, hauing more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilst as yet it remained somewhat doubtful, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his person, was detected by a groom of his, to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, vnto the extremities of the torture, he confessed, that he had bene set on by Thraso; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were neare in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were in dedde the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streetes, and neuer shrank for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yield to no extremity. Thus they all escaped, and soone after found means to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resolved vpon siding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loueto seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great needfullie, had of late been such, as might haue bene termed exceeidie, were it not in regard of his prouidence, wherein he tooke order for his owne Estate, that depended vpon theirs. But the young Nephew, taking little heede of dangers farre off, regarded onely the things present, the weakenesse of Rome; the preualent fortunes of Carthage; and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vaine, to shoulder vp a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entered into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne; but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing that he was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betweene the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needs haue them tell him the order of the fight at Canna, that he might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe, saying, That he could hardly beleue the Carthaginians to so wonderful was the victory as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he should reigne ouer all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied, with what they could get in Italic. At these doings Appius Claudius did not greatly sturie: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, than were enforced vpon them by necessity; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had receiued such blemish, by that which hapned vnto him in his iourney, as much discontented him when he came into Sicily, and forbade him to looke bigger. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their needfullie, this Appius was to carry backe vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But in stead of returning the money with thanks, as he had bin directed, and as it had bin noised abroad that he should doe: the were against Philip King of Macedon (wherof we haue spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine-glorie, and send word after him, that he should consign that money ouer to Marcus Valerius, of whose voyage into Greece, the Citie had not otherwise wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is reixed with pride) his error was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimity, into such a pittifull tune of thanksgiving, as must needs haue bred sorrow and commiseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or if it were deliuered after his death, matter of pastime & scorrie, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilst Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resolved how to begin it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great inuocation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might haue prospered more than euer, had it bene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom wee spake before, were sent about the Country with two thousand men, to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fiftene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a city of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators took him on the fudden as he was passing through a narrow street: and rushing betweene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the sound of that word so ioyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp, the Army, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcasle to lie vnburied. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking allo of the Kings horses, posted away; to signifye all that had passed, to stirre vp the people to liberie, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he or his fellowes would make offer to usurpe a Tyranny. The Syracusians hereupon presently tooke Armes, and made themselves masters of their owne City. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Place, and the Island: being yet vncertaine what to doe, betweene desire of making himselfe a Soueraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise mis-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well knowne Proverbe, which Dionysius had vsed; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were halld out of it by the beeles, and not ride away from it on horse backe. But feare, and better counsaile so prevailed to farr, that Andronodorus, having slip vpon the matter, dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope vnto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the people: telling them, that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaued themselves in so great a change; that hee had stood in feare, lest they would not haue conuyned themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather haue sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to ramish their liberty force, but to wed it vnto them for euery, he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered vp the charge committed vnto him, by one that had been an euill euill master both to him and them. Hereupon great ioy was made, and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraignty, and so vehement were the insigations of his wife, that shortly hee beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himselfe strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had bene with the Syracusian Pretors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to instructions of their Capaine, had done him, whilst he liued, what seruice they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed, and with a conuoy, that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earne thanks of Hannibal, with such a little courtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Harmonia the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slayne out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilst Hieronymus liued, as by his authority; and now since attempted, in seeking to vsurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessory to this dangerous treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recovered those royall ornaments and Soueraigne power, whereof their family was now dispossest. These daughters therefore of Hiero & Gelo were also condemned to die; and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liues. Demarata, and Harmonia had perhaps deferred this heauy sentence: but Heracles, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered together with her two young daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash iudgment. Her husband Sosippus was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that respect hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to king Ptolomie, &c. he durst not returne home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardonning themselves) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule a butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate, and knowing not otherwise how to satisfy their anger, they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue liue cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not onely of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the ekle Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betwene the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing striven in vain; and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicily, they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor, attended by such fugitiues and mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to doe many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all of late serued one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their Treeres the Tyrant was slayne, and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enioy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion ouer those that had broken the Chaine, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his aduice was, that such their arrogance should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was giuen by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans & Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had bene subiect to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Vassals vnto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due, Epicides told them, that in this notable change, they had fit opportunity to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had bene subdued by the same hand, which tooke liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yielded vnto Syracuse, and bene subiect vnto that Citie, by what forme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable, than iust. Neuertheless, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: in so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans, and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to obserue the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all saue the Castle, wherinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled; and stealing thence away by night, conueyed themselves into the towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captains vsed after victory, to seeke out the fugitive Roman slaues and renegados, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Towne-men and Souldiers, he tooke to mercy; forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary fort. It was sayd, that he had slaine, Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusian Army vpon the way, as it was going to ioyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had bene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Sosis and Dionomenes, two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Country: but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had bene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and set them a worke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their seruice. So towards Herbesus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischief, deuising what further harme they might doe; but now so weakly accompanied, that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore aduerted vpon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus unarmed, with Oliue branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Creet were in the van-guard; that that had been well used by Hieronymus, and some of them greatly bound unto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and lowly dismissed them. These Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare, saying, That no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vse their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with general approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by severity, which would not serue. For when they commanded these two traitors to be layd in yrons; the exclamation was so violent against them, that faime they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a trick, whereby to help himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he stood. He cauled Letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trusty Cretans, directed as they made shew from the Syracusian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines; but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in general, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed, the vproare was such, that Sesto and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the Campe; and flicke their liues. All the Syracusians remaying behinde, had bene cut in peeces by the enraged souldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saued their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had srued amongst the Leontines, to iustifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witnes. This incensed not onely the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (sayd some) was the auarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse, where their greedy appetites might haue bene tempted with a farre greater booty. Whilst they were thus discoursing, and deuising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnto for want of helpe, they would be trayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faime haue kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the towne, that laboured to breake it open. So he entered and immediately fell vpon the Pretors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day hee went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue liberty vnto all slaues and prisoners, and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he neare with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to do hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants, and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enioy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be deliuered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly so answered, That if their errand had bene to him, he could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the gouernement in their hands. As for the warre which they threatened; he told them; they should finde by experience, That to besiege Syracuse, was another manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus he sent them gone, and returned backe into the City. Immediately beganne the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of wals as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terror in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Neuertheless all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of preuailling by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hasty victorie. But there liued at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of Warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could haue bene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age bene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remooue the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proofe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to conuert his studie vnto things of vse; that might preserue the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done vnto the liberal sciences, to subvert learned Propositions, vnto the workmanship, and gain, of base handicrafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that seemed vnto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we easily taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath bene the vnhappy fate of great inventions, to be villified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued; as filling within compass of the meane & wile things, that euery one could well haue performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discoverie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he underwent before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent proofe. He that looks vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Ale, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the lesse, for that the labor of workmanship growes to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes, which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholars and wifemen, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily ouer, and feede their workmen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankind; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of iniustice, that the long trauells of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; yeeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as hauing Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and reacheth against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, whereunto God hath denied to indue them. Neuertheless, if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection that euery one ought to beare vnto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to shine vpon the iust, and vniust: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lye buried in their owne bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning; that may be peruerced by euill men to a mischieuous vse. For if the secret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irreuerable poyson: much better it were, that such a iewel remaine close in the hands of a wife and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended vnto very commendable ends. They were Engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse, not fit for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vse them, but referred so much to his owne direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that he had approued vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done especiall benefit to his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had sundrie devices, of which any one fort might haue repelled the assaillants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heavy stones & long pieces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay fare off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoisted vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rocks: and all of them were so beaten that they durst neuer come to any second assault. In the like sort was the Land-armie handled. Stones & timber, falling vpon it like hails; did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assault. For remedie hereof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could early before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blanche, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were wound vp hard to shoot a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaillants liues. For the shot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were unable to tarry by it) euen till they were gotten very fare off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood vpon the walls, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without; hee might haue holpen by some device, to make them vnuerneiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of fight, being erected in the streetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vie them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouision of victuals, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very desperate peece of worke. For the enemies hauing so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likelie so soone to bee consumed with famine, as the besiegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, hauing no probability to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honorable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates aduertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there to deale with the Senate, that sue and twentie thousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicily by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischief, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He tooke Pelorus and Herbesus, which yeelded vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and sacke: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue saued Agrirentum: whither he came too late, for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned backetoward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he vsed, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foote, and five hundred horse, intending to ioyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie, against the disperfed and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation heereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entered with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arrived at Marcellus his Campe: yet many places revolted vnto the Carthaginians, and slew or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus leaving some of his Armie before Syracuse, that hee might not seeme to haue giuen ouer the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intenuie to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrirentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as unable to preuaile: & he himself was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not faine, an enterprise that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially he assaied to preuaile by treason, against which no place can hold out. And to this end he deale with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his Campe; exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the Towne would harken to no parlee. At length a slave vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where hee talked inpruate with some few, as hee had bene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vied to send him aduertisement of their proceedings, by a slier boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, that had bene sent out of the Towne as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon; was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, iudged it lesse than it had bene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it, made all things ready, and waited a conuenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly garded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surpris. But a fugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great fast was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three daies: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not bee wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festiuall night, came vnto the walls, which he took by Scala. Syracuse was diuided into foure parts (or fives, if Epipole were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie then before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina & the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to harken vnto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans had taken and sackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those that were sheltered from strong houles: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnurnished of his helpe; since they held out a good while and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegados, were more carefull than euer to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell vpon the olde Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicides sallied out of Acraadin vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Affiliants were repell'd. Neuerthelesse, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as freightly besieged, as hee himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat lesse) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to doe his Countreys seruice: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. Hee arriv'd at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid, being loth to double the Cape, for that the windes did better serue the enimie than him. Thither sail'd Epicides out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much inuention, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, hee stood off into the deepe; and sail'd away to Tarentum, bidding Sicily farewell. Then durst not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Agriuentum: where he expected the issue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian Souldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as neere as they could safely, vnto Marcellus; and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicily was giuen as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Towne. Heereunto Marcellus willingly gaue ear: for hee had staid there long enough; and had cause to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong againe. Hee therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their libertie and proper lawes; yet suffering the Romans to possess whatsoever had belonged vnto the Kings. Heereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates euen ready to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitives disturbed all. These perceiving their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, that the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betrayed the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke Armes, and fell vpon the new chosen Pretors; whom they slue, and made election of fixe Captaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting onely the fugitives. The Treatie was therefore againe set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delay'd; eyther by some feare of the Citizens, that had seene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman auarice in the sack of Epizola, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vse the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subiect to Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the fixe Captaines, that had been chosen in the last commotion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercinaries; holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: hauing a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This craftie Agent perswaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spaine; and that if euer he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where else; it was now the onely time to do it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanish Captaine was easily wonne, and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusan Embassadors to ratifie the couenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hero to the Romans had bene such, as deserved not to be requited with the ruine of his Countreie: much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Army of Mercinaries, should minister

vnto the people of Rome, aduantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armic. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had bene their thiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also bene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rafcalitie, and some ill aduic'd Persons ioynd with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Lemium; and afterward beeb'd in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken: Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargaine vnder-hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercinaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, & promise of good visage in time to come; than to restore the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthy, strong, and many waies important. Neuerthelesse if we consider the many inconueniences and great mischiefs whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by euill neighbours; and by that very forme of politie, after which it was gouerned: wee may truly affirme, That it receiued no small benefit, by becoming subiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not onely assured against all forraigne enimies, domestick conspiracies, and such Tyrans as of olde had reign'd therein: but freed from the necessitie of banishing, or murdering, the most worthe Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand thelike miseries, that were wont to grow out of the iealousie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enioyed that Citie, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as there wherein it flourish'd, when it rested secure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serues not to make iniustice the more excusable: vnlesse we should approue the answer of that Thiefe, who being found to haue stolen a siluer cup from a sicke man, said, Hee neuer loses drinking.

By the treachon of Mericus, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein the booty that it found, was said to haue bin no lesse, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly workes and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was maruellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; saue onely the houses of those banished men, that had escap'd from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busie about his Geometric, in drawing figures, that hee harkened not to the noyse, and vpror in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heauily the death of him; and caus'd his body to be honourably buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordain'd in his lifetime) was plac'd a Cylinder & a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which hee first found out. An Invention of so little vse, as this may seeme, pleas'd that great Artift better, than the deuising of all those engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would thinke the monie lost, that had bin spent vpon a forme, whose studies in the Vniuersitie had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicily yeek'd vnto the Romans, except Agriuentum and a few places thereabout. At Agriuentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good peeces of seruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides aduanc'd to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and nor behaue themselves as men expecting to be besieg'd. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and droue them headlong into their Trenches. This bred enie in Epicides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that that hauing beene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; In that hee had sent vnto him Mutines, to be his Companion, & to take vpon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside vnto Heracles, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epides) not to meddle with the enemie, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight; and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoeuer disproportion was betweene the two Armies; farre greater were the odds betweene the Captaines. For howsoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceiued some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heracles; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious enuy of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a foolish desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countreman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but onely looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did fully & stily set vpon the enemies, that hee brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousand, droue them backe into Agigentum.

If Hanno could haue beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of Warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battell without need; the Romans would shortly haue beene reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leaue the Prouince; and soone vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The same of this new Armie drew manie of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Cama, tooke it very hainously, that no good seruice done, could bring so them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, & not suffered to return backe to Rome with their General. Mutines had pacified his Countreman the Numidians; & like an honest man, did what hee could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue bene, if the Armie lately ouerthrowne had beene entire. McCornelius the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. Hee recovered those In-land Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Country; yet hee hindered the Country from reuoluing vnto Mutines. About threecore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which Agigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as hee pleased, in despite of the Romans: not onely to the succour of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. Hee had (belike) receiued instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue share in the honour of these Sicilian Warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied, whilest Italie was neglected, that should haue beene regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Assistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gave it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this spitefull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoeuer the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countreman, being such a braue Commander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Lauius, the Roman Consull, was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these these indignities; but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauored by those that bore all the sway in Carthage: He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countreman had lately done, content himselfe to see his Adversaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliuer vp Agigentum, and to helpe to expell them utterly out of Sicil. The Consull was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had vnder-taken. For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noyse, thought it had beene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and sauing himselfe, with Epides, in a small Barke, set saile for Africke; leaving all his Armie and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Lauius the Consull hauing taken Agigentum, did sharpe execution of iustice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaues, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raised of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessity of gold, than of Steele: which may haue beene the reason, why Lauius dealt so cruelly with the Agigentines. Neuertheless the same of such seueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yielded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliuered vp by Treason, and sixe onely staid to be wonne by force. These things done, Lauius returned home to Rome; carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agitina; that were a Prouince of out-laws, bankrupts, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoyle of others, in these trouble some times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exercise their owne occupation against the Brutians; a theeuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he liued in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipios in their iourne against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall seruice. So by this enterprize of Sicil, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue beene employed in Italie: leauing yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and Hannibal in Italie, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metanrus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good seruices done in the Iland of Sicil, he had granted vnto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Oration. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Prouince. He staid not long in Rome, before he was againe chosen Consull together with M. Valerius Lauius, who succeeded him in the gouernment of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consull Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consull, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to become themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto the the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to acknowledge, the Senate made such an end of the controuersie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subiection, but comforting them, with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath bene shewed before. The two new Consuls, Marcellus and Leuinus, were appointed to make warre, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italie, the other in Sicill. The life of Sicill fell vnto Marcellus; which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet bene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindered by feare, from vttering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his businesse with them was dispatcht, he gently vnderooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countie in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicill, whose doings there haue bene already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the warre, and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Naue. They were all of the poorer sort, that vsed to be employed in Sea-seruices; especially in rowing. These could not liue with our present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasury to giue them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be let out at the expence of priuate men; who, in this necessitie of the State, were driuen to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter vnto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine: or doe, in a case of such excommunitie. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could ynde goe; and somewhat more, then could with honesty haue bene imposed vpon it. Neuertheless it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasury was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no persiuasions would be so effectiuall with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was, that the People also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That euery one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasury, all the mony that he had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoeuer; excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods; as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euery one did vse, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuse to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publike necessitie could no otherwise be holpen; euery one was contented, that his priuate estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it suffered wracke, in vaine could any particular man hope to enioy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimitie deferred well that greatness of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Conuenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citie against Hannibal, and Leuinus toward Sicill. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard seruice: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke vpon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the losse of Capua: which gaue them cause to looke vnto themselves, as if in his helpe there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in need. This he well perceiued; yet could notrell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garriisons into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his armie, that he should not be able to keepe the field: or else he must leaue them to their owne fidelity, which now began to wauer. At length his iealetie grew to outrageous, that he sacked, and wasted, those places that he was vnable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe, and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before hee had least cause to doubt. The Towne of Salapia yeelded vnto Marcellus; and betrayed vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that serued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, then the Towne it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dafius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafius in priuate; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuicted and charged of Treason, hee so stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuiled out of meere malice, knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his aduerfariie anew, and urge him from time to time, with such liuely reasons; that he who could not be beleued by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the fauour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul tooke by force, Maronea and Meles, Townes of the Samnit; wherein he slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch aduantages, where hee might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than he. The best was, that his Carthaginians, haue wearied themselves with ill speede in many pettie enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italie, to follow businesse of far lesse importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had bene so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better season, Rome it selfe might haue bene stricken downe, the next yere after that great blow receiued at Canna. But since that which is past cannot be amended, Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightie succour would come time enough. For Masinissa was at Carthage with fiftie thousand Numidians, ready to set faile for Spain: whether when he came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal should forthwith take his iourne into Italie, of which there had bene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best, the Romans to prevent the threatening mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the coming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his ground, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay nere vnto Herdonia to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, since, nere vnto the same place, another Cn. Fuluius had lost his Armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward, and came to Herdonia: where Fuluius heard newes of his approach. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor; who accepted it with more haste than good speede. The Roman Legions made good resistance awhile, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rowt; and great slaughter was made of them. Fuluius himselfe, with twelue Tribunes or Cornets, were lost: of the common Souldiers, that were slaine, the number is vncertaine; some reporting seuen, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonia, because it was at point to haue yeelded vnto Fuluius, Hannibal did set on fire: and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheere; for that hee would shortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apaces; and overtaking him at Numistro in the Countie of the Lucans, fought with him a battell: which beginning at nine of the clocke in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darkenesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often; and sought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet aduenture nothing, but by open day-light, and vpon faire ground.

This passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fuluius, hee that laste he had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Romans affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yere to besiege Tarentum; which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that serued vnder him the yere before) to presse the Carthaginian too hard, as he might haue no leisure to helpe

Tarentum.

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannasi-um, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall teammes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Armie strong vntill the coming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunity of Marcellus, nor brooke the indignity of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men be lustie, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to be at quiet, vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile; wherein Hannibal had the victory; tooke sixe Ensignes; and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of mark. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pefantes, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had beene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stratageime. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, he did to vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall; they besought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victory; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their so shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet; and therefore was ready to fight againe; since all other mortuities continued the same, and his men had beene hartned by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so deere a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late receiued ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Neuertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volscenies; that willingly yeelded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fulvius entertained in louing sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had beene authours, or busied others in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theues, which Leuinus had lately brought from Agaturna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caulonia, a Towne of the Bruttians: and nothing was omitted, that might serue to diuert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, sat downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne, a good part were Bruttians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, she gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her lover was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Bruttian were farr in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistis, to doe what she would haue him. The Consul hearing this; and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to conuey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitiue; and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Bruttian Captaine: and partly by his owne perswasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister, wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolved how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that that Bruttian kept watch, and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Capitaines in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Bruttians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate; whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as happeneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vied now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well vsed, because of hospitalitie that had passed betwene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword: in such sort, that they spared few of the Bruttians. This slaughter of the Bruttians, was thought to haue beene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preferred his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasure, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols, that seemed worthy to be carried away, taking very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill, which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yeelded. When this businesse was done, he hastied away to relieue Tarentum. But when he came within fiew miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans haue also their Hannibal; we haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne backe amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul, he incamped a few dayes together, so neere as he was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgieue them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote backe by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made ready his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen, or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Romans; the iourney to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discouered all.

This yeere was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got euery where, save onely at Caulonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellows, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue so beene rid of them. But their common pouerty, & disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered, that the Legions of Cannae, and those unhappy Companies, that had beene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported into Sicily; where they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhausted with leues of men, and impositions of mony: in euery of which yeeres they had receiued some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare, or rather the best that they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe with in a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer returned. Such talke was frequent amongst those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly deny vnto the Romans their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: where of otherwife they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Townes make such declaration, and protest their dilabillity of giuing any farther helpe; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other then treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campani or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteen Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but shewed themselves willing to vndergoe whatsoever should be layd vpon them, without thinking vnder the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commendation of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute, it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leaue them to their owne consideration of their ill-deuising.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue people would haue wrought in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then must the Romans haue betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subiects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopefull and fortunate iucess. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priuie treasure; and thence take out the gold that had beene layd vp to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie, and to prouide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this yeere, & the next were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, then at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amiss to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driuen to furnish the Armie in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was far lesse then fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoever Lucius rather inclines to those, who say, that he got it loone after his arrivall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their yeere it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spain, though he came not into Italy vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Cannæ, Hannibal had lost much time about Cume and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good hauein, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Eastern parts of Italy; where he made ready a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had beene ready to come. But since his hope was vanisht, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later then had beene expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein he might make a partie against the Romans. The loss of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from harkening any sollicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouerty of the Roman, and the wearinesse of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie coming, then that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Aruntines, to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard to their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeere following they were deuising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors; partly by terror of seuerer iudgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wils; and tooke many hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Fabius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri, one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of engines, sending for a fleet out of Sicily to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the Citie: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal, whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no need to stand vpon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage, referring his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus tooke no pleasure: but sought to compel the Enemy to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded againe to assaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betwene Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and hauing lost about three thousand of their company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and saue their owne liues within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to do, he neglected no advantage. There lay betwene him and them an Hillocke, ouer-grown with wood, that seemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vndiscerned, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe, and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground, the Consuls thought it fit to remove their Campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neerer enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rodero view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principall men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gaue warning of their approach to his fellowes; who discouered not themselves, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls and their traine. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then began euery one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe. The rest of the Colonels and Officers; together with the Licitors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all flaine or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a siluer pot, couered it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custody of Hannibal; who might vse it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore he sent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was slaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring; wishing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arriued there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captiue Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where hee willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should thinke needefull. The deuise was plaine: and no lesse plaine wasthe reuengfull minde, which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein beene betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent backe the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a fiend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, & bade open the gates; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened, faire and leisuely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must be, to let them enter. But when sixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselves; being laied aron all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Laetri; where vnto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicily, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrours, made the Romans in all confusd haste, run to their ships: leauing all their engines, and whatsoever was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the ruiniuing Consul, & requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Common wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soone after died. Then was it thought needefull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay to nere vnto the Enemy, without any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were not onely valiant, but well aduised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent, and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more staied wit. The fathers therefore endeauored to ioine vnto him in the Consulship M. Linius: one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Linius had beene Consul with L. Aemilius Paulus, in the yere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good seruice, they had both of them beene called into iudgement by the People: and this Linius condemned; Aemilius hardly elapsing. Though it hath beene once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankfull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honourable men. For in the battaile of Canna, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Aemilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest ouerthrow that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Tarentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Linius, hee is euen now readie, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had hee beene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrie Grange; still vexing himselfe with the indigntie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Linius, being Consuls two or three yeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued private in discontented sort, as might appeare, both both by his carelesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Censors, to pull his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vied to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was proposed, either in short formall words, or in passing from side to side, when the house was diuided. At length it hapned, that in some businesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman; he stood vp, and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had beene. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many braue men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather serued to fill vp the number, than to answere to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had euen spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to say; that it was great pittie, so worthy and able a man, as this Linius, had beene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common wealth stood in great neede, yet had not vied in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consils ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Maximus, being both of them Patricians, could be ioyned with Claudius Nero: euery one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two better men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Linius. But Linius would not endure to heare of this. He said it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases he resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the People, and repaid good for euill; hee was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather; but run vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulnesse, to well-deseruing men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the second King of Macedonia his dealing with the Duke of Alua. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, vpon some small offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the seruice of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wisdom often taught by necessity.

It was a dangerous yeere toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius were chosen Consuls. Asdrubal was already come into France, and waited onely, to haue the wayes of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans vied at this time the seruice of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leue and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure serued in Spain, two in Sicily, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in several parts of Italy, where neede seemed to require, that onely two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall obseruance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Linius would not stirre out of Rome against so mightie a power as followed Asdrubal, vntill he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeere, among the Cisalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Linius; to whom the warre against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentine, were vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie, that was sent against Hannibal. Nevertheless the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Lius, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was already passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwell in the Countrie about Genoa, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to ioine with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would adventure no further, than hee safely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth to the Citie, each, his seuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, aff. fied, than they had beene, when Le Amylius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie beimes: but rather they stood in feare, lest all diligence, wisdom and valour should proue too little. For since few yeeres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not bene flaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; there two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should retorne home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer since the battaile of Canna: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italie. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riues and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenes at his first setting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a penfue traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus and Crispinus, vpon whom in the like sort they had giuen attendance the last yeere; but saw neither of them retorne aliae, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Livius, that he should abstaine from fighting, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answere, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victory; or by seeing the overthrow of his owne vniust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the ioy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spaine by Scipio, a little before he tooke his iourne into Italie, such mention hath already beene made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Linie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius: his historie concerning this accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reason of those Capitaines that were sent from the Citie of Carthage, to ioyne with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the aduantage of their owne side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courtes vndertaken, it cannot be knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the spitefull dealing of Hanno in Sicily with Mutines, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Iland: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischieuous Partisans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuerthelesse Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His iourne into Italie being resolved vpon: he lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the mines of siluer; whence hee was to furnish his expedition. Thither came Scipio: and drave him out of his Campe, though hee were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Capitaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The overthrow seemes not to haue bene so great, as it must haue bene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, sent away all his mony, with his Elephants before him: but staid he himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might be cut off: after which he retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed on euergate. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pirenees: leaving the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal.

the sonne of Gesco; than himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Hee would Scipio haue stopped him on his iourne; by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountaines. But whether Asdrubal took another way for which they forced the guards that Scipio had set to keepe the Pyrenes (as the defence of this passage commonly fons to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Coming into Gaul, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made: but he and his Armie, well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choyce: for that hee was driuen to Winter in their Countre; whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iourne ouer the Alpes; were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he trauielled through their Countre. For these poore men, at the first coming of Hannibal, were verily persuaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattails, and to make spoyle of that little wealth, which they had painefully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in proesse of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre disioyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alpes did onely lye in the way: they gladly consented, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gaules. The Lyguriens also ioynd with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians haue done; if he had arrived in their Countre. There was no other Roman Armie neere, then L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his coming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there he lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprise: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Asdrubal's his iourne, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintering camps, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speede he could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about fortie thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driuen to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countre of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were other wise too weake for the iourne intended. Afterward coming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuerthelesse he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driuen to retorne to Metapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Armie; he assailed againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, hauing Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuer Ausonia to Canusium, where he fate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorablen victory. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countre very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Canusium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once hee had gotten in the same open Countre. If this had so fallen out; Rome would haue bene vn-donen for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue needed to wish any second victory, in the naked Champans about Canna; if such an armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilst Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was coming to their succour: he was aduertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew on wards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; and notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Linus the Consul. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing ioyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioynd as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that howe soeuer the fortune of Rome should auoid, for the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so long a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirte Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the coniunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the suddaine, yet within few yeeres, was like to worke most lamentable effects. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe seruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foote, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choyce of his Armie: and making shew, as if he would onely step aside, to doe some small piece of seruice neere at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which hee was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him, with victuals, and all other necessities for his Armie. Linus the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neere vnto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In sixe dayes Nero had finished his iourneither; and when he drew neere, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his comming. Linus thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of covert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: lest the Enemy, perceiving this absence of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done; and a token giuen, that the Colonels, Captaines, and all Souldiers, as well horse as foote, that Nero had brought with him; should be lodged and entertained by men of their owne sort. Their Companie was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that ioynd with them on the way. Neuerthelesse, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should be enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few dayes after their wearisome iourne, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand, that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiving that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue beene vndertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generals pailion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile, hauing long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had bene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long iourne. Hereupon he beganne to with-draw his Armie backe into the Campe: and gaue order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet should there good obseruation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath bene said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded onely once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the the quarter of Linus the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders; held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good case, hee was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke, till hee might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces, hee had not cared hitherto; how neere he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with over-strictly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So hee dislodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the Riner Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessity of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heauie, and hindered his speede: farre he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staid him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouer-taken with necessity to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemy should not, without much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the right wing he flood himselfe with his Africans & Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants, he bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Linus of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderstood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was vnto the vanquished. Onely the Romans hercin seemed to haue had the better in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to haue fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Linus the Consul with a proud brauery, to giue charge on the Africans: by whom hee was so sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Linus therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great laughter on both sides, preuailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules; that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Linus: which hauing compassed, he fell vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victory to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ranne all along the depth of Asdrubal his battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rowt. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken alive: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode iotem. For when any of them, being fore wounded, beganne to waxe unruly, and rush backe vpon their own battaile following them: the guide had in readinesse a Maller, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betwene the eares, in the ioynt of the neck, next vnto the head; wherewith he killed the beast vpon the suddaine. This speedy way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squadrons following them; is said to haue bene the deuice of Asdrubal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by *Polibi*us, and by Linus. He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother; to haue striven with great patience, against many difficulties; wherinto he fell fell by the meanes of those Capaines that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to haue performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally when hee saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where fighting bravelly he was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Linie, and of Polybius doe very much disagree. For Linie saith; that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Cannae; that fiftie fise thousand of them were slaine, fise thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners; and about foure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at liberty. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand; and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not onely in other kindes, but in gold and siluer. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to haue bene as rich as Linie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with monie. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metawru, a parallel vnto that of Cannae) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman; to haue bene slaine. The number of the prisoners hee doeth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all he rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme that they were all Barchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Countrey, about their liues.

The joy of this victorie was no lesse in Rome, then had bene the feare of the event. For euer since it was knowne in what sort Nero had left his Armie; the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consull should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to haue notice of his departure; and either pursue him, or let vpon the Armie that staid behinde; much weakened, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke; yet reseruing their censure vnto the success; with libertie to approve or condemn, according to the issue. In the meane time the people filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting still ready hand vpon the Magistrates; if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would aske euery ones helpe. In briefe they were all full of melancholy, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleue it. Afterwards when Messengers arriued from the Consuls, with Letters contrayning all that had passed: there was not onely great and ioyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their priuate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe); and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians; and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of the misadventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and faire different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generals, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoeuer the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That hee forgot himselfe, being our-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metawru that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countrey of the Brutians: and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remooue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For hee wanted men to defend defend so many places as hee held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compasse in the vmoost corner of Italie; being a Countrey of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vnited; or because it is likely that this remooue of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harvest was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Linius the other Consull tarried among the Cisalpine Gauls vntill the end of Summer, therto let things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Armie in that Province; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he desired leaue to returne home; and that hee might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well vnderstood his meaning: which was, to haue the honour of triumph, as hee well deserved. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late victorie: order was giuen, that not onely Linie with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero, though leaving his Armie behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Linie made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers, because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armie also being present at the triumph. But Nero hat rode on horse-backe, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victorie was in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Peturcius Philo and L. Caelius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, the due acknowledgement of their good seruice. For they were commend'd vnto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls: and Consuls they were chosen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthe of memorie, in their Consulship. Neither indeed for this yeere; which was the thirtieth of the present warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; save only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surprise. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceiued of him; that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himselfe vpright. And surely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius; whom Linie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, he obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armie, compounded of so many sundrie Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they neuer fell to sedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Linie addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, hee kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Asdrubal, he made no inuasion vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leaue him, vntill hee be drawne into Affric by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

6. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

I.

How the Carthaginians were driuen by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

Mago and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, took vpon them the charge of Spain; when Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italie. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Balears; there to leaue a supply of men:

men: and Asdrubal with-draw himselfe into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meane to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately beene employed in Sicill) who brought new forces out of Africke, and came to succeed in place of Asdrubal the Barchine. It is not vnlkelie that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage, when that soone of Amilcar, whose authoritie had beene greatest, was thence deported. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home; or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought over: Hanno tooke the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the Country of the Celiberians, not very farre from new Carthage: where, by monie, and other persuasions, he leuied about nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: atten-tine, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Italie, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celiberians: he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celi-berians, who became his guides, that their Countreimen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home.
Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neere to these Celiberians: and falling vpon them on the suddaine, gaue them such an ouerthrow, that Hanno and Mago comming to their succour, in stead of heartning and reinforcing them, became partakers of the losse.
Mago saued himselfe with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies iourney brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saued most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie stood, by the comming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countreie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intirentie to the necessitie and successe of his Countreimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might hee well aduenture, to take in hand the entie conquest of Spaine; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an ouerthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that serued vnder Hannibal, and those that had beene sent over into Africke; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countreie was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noyed abroad, That all which had followed Asdrubal into Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie was closed vp in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italie, which gaue such confidence vnto Scipio; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprise in hand, vntill the Summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore vied the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garisons; hindered the enemy from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother
L. Scipio tooke by assault the Towne of Oringis.

Against the next yeeres danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Armie: and spared not cost, nor trouble, in strengthening himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With seuenie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleeeue, that he could hardly haue raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore hee iudged it needfull to vie the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtfull; of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest neede. Yet since one Celiber, that was Lord of eight and twenty Townes, had promised him the last Winter; to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his seruice: he refused to make vse of those, and some few others, that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee able to doe any great harme; if they would reuolt. So with five and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, hee sought out the Enemy; neere vnto whom hee was encamped. At his first comming, Mago and Masanißa fell vpon him; with hope to take him vnprepared, whilest he was making his lodgings. But he layed certaine troupes of horse in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fall off.

They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly berooke themselves to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans; and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmishes betwene the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Asdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches:
the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many daies: Asdrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the euening, withdrew himselfe into his Trenches.
The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposit to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many daies together: it grew to bee the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies long before designed. But Scipio when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier then he had beene wont. He caused his men and horses, to be well fedde betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to traine out the Carthaginians with their bellies emptic: yfing herein the same trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the battaile. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertaine the Romans; whilest
he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which hee was encamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not bee discerned which part had the better: since being ouer-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat vnto their foote; and one troope seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, hauing well fed themselves, were like to hold out better then the Enemy. But about noone hee caused his wings to aduance a good pace; leaving their battaile of Spaniards farre behind them, that came on leisurely; according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal his wings, were noway comparable, saue only in number, to the Latine and Romane Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leuied in haste, and fighting onely in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose, they were sorely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginians would faine haue succoured them; but that they durst not stirre out of their places, because of the Spanish battell which was comming against them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Armie stood idle, whilest the wings were broken. For, had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards, hee must haue cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betwene the Romane wings: to the depth whereof when hee had arrived, hee should haue found himselfe enclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battaile of Cannæ. Wherefore hee did onely employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance ledde them, and troubled both parties; or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In process of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lustie; when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heate of the day.
Where-

Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly : and gave no over, till they had forst the enemy to change his pace and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to have made an orderly retreat; and afterward againe, to have caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victorie to be so extorted from them : neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished ; ledde by the obstinate passion of feare which harkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day beene taken ; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the sodaine, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to give over.

The same night Asdrubal gave no rest to his men : but caused them, hungry, and overlaboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe ; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he have in the strength of his Trenches ; when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Atanes, that was Lord of the Turdians, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subiects : many followed this example ; and soone after, two strong Townes were yeelded up to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seemes that the perverse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleue the more easilily those reports which they heard from Italie. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away faster then an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter : for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, save onely seven thousand that with Asdrubal himselfe recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in hast. The place he made shift a while to defend : but wanting there necessities to sustain himselfe long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore hee resolved to make shift for one ; and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence ; hee tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio understood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masanija staid in it) whilst hee with the rest of the Army did what was needfull in the Countrey abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masanija followed Asdrubal to Gades : and their Army dispersed it selfe ; some flying over to the Romans ; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were onely three Townes left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of warre against the Romans : of which onely Castulo had a Carthaginian Garrison ; consisting of such as had saved themselves by flight in the late overthrowes. Hereby it seemes, that the report of these Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yeelded long since vnto the Romans ; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes beene inclinable to the Romans ; if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipios, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune ; it not onely rebelled ; but with great cruelty betrayed, and flue, the poore men that escaped thither from the overthrowes. Astapa was a Towne that still adhered to the Carthaginians ; and which was worse, had thriven by the spoyle of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeere) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Illiturgi and Castulo : Illiturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants ; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdabellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius ; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place : whereinto was throwne all the gold, & silver, with whatsoever else was precious, the women and children standing by it vnder a sure guard ; that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This provision being made : all the Inhabitants that could beare Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman campe, where striving beyond their power, they were euerie one slaine. Then was the Towne forth with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it : and many of the Romans consumed with the flame ; whilst they rushed over-hastily to catch the gold, and silver, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there : but returned home to Carthage, with seven Gallies, leaving Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Masiffis, a people of the Numidians ; hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his cuill Angel, in the Kings Port : who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, having driven the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forth-with bethink himselfe, how to finish the war ; by putting them to the like distresse in Africke. Hereunto it seemed that the helpe of Syphax would be much available : a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement ; of which in all likelihood he might easilily be moved to seeke reuenge. He had also bin beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him over a Captaine into Africke ; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as hee thereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the Citie in time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Africke ; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent over C. Lelius his Embassador, to deale with Syphax : who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, easilily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Onely Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League ; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended ; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquere Gallies he tooke Sea ; and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Asdrubal. This would have been very dangerous to him, had he beene defied by his Enemies further at Sea : but in the Haven they forbore to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud ; seeing at one time, two such Captaines of two most powerful Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace ; but the Romans excused himselfe, by want of such Commission from the Senate. Hee feasted them together : and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entered into Couenant ; which in time of performance, hee as readily brake.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell betwene two Spanish Princes. A digression, concerning Duells.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon those of Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath beene said before. The Conquest of the Countrey being then in a manner at an end ; hee performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memorie of his Father and Uncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that hee should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues, as was vied in the Citie of Rome : for there were enow, that either offered themselves as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes, to give prooffe in single combat, of the valour that was in their severall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controversies, to trial of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orfus, Celtic Germans : that contended for the principality of a Towne called Iber. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne : wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Tamils. But the father of Orfus stood lately seized of the Principality : which though himselfe received by the death of his elder brother, yet this his sonne would not let it goe backe ; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, & old enough to rule. Fine would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in vain, to take up this quarrell ; and that neither God, nor Men, but onely Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire betwene them. So they had their wills : and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skillfull at his weapon, easilily vanquished the more hardinesse of the younger.

Such combats haue beene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others; as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one betwene Paris and Menelaus, the other, betwene Hector and Ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes; whereof that betwene Dauid and Goliath, and others performed by some of Dauid's worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betwene twelue of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren Curatii that were Albans. The combat of Mamilius Torquatus, and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as hauing only reference to brauerie. In England there was a great Combat fought betwene Edmond Ironside and Canutus the Dane, for no lesse matter than the Kingdome. The vie of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon every occasion, great or small. In the reigne of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mounfort against the Earle of Blois contending for the Duchie of Brittaine; there was a fight, for honor of the Nations, betwene thirtie of the Britons, and thirtie English: two of which English, were Calueria braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them haue bin combats of brauerie, and of gayete de cœur, as the French terme it; for honour of feuerall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or whatsoever else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life, or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which we spake euen now, betwene Corbus and Orsua. Vnto these (me thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betwene Dauid and Goliath, or that betwene the Horatii and Curatii: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is ad-ventured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betwene the Lord Henrie of Boulbroke Duke of Hertford, and Moubray
An. 21. Ric. 2. Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Anley and one Cattington: whom Anley charged with treason: and proued it vpon him by being victorious.
An. 3. Ric. 2. The like was fought betwene Robert of Mountfort, and Henrie of Essex. The like also,
An. 9. Henr. 2. betwene a Nauarrois, & one Welch of Grimby, whom the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belied him, and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had beene due to the offender, if the accusation had beene proued; I cannot asseme. But wee euery where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) be overcome, Hee shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramor and Loy, or offered to do, in the reigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, hee that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loseth onely his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in Campe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the faire his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lord, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorialls of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vpon, each of the parties should pay two shillings six pence; but if it were performed, then should the partie vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vse when as any man hath had an hard or vnjust iudgement; saying, That hee was tried by the Law of Loy, or Berne, ou le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent by battaille, that great learned man Tuo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complain, and specially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the iudgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this libertie and kinde of triall, was retrencht by S. Lewis, and Philip the faire, so that no man could decree, or grant it, saue the King himselfe. It hath since beene granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Carages against Jacques le Gros; and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro, his Countimian: wherein Sir Henrie Kneuer, Father of the Lord Kneuet now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had the victorie; and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deseruing death, (and in thoe only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces defences per une demerit; The defendant was bound to plead not guilty; by giuing the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did faiblement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Levanto the Emperour Charles the first, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: euen the victorie Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giuing of the Lie mortallitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to haue it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the first had patiently endure.

From this beginning is driued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obedience and Refutation of capital offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe so many Duells, as are founded vpon mere priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly libertie, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats; the giuing of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull roote of deadly quarrells. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so vnparadonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that giues it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is growne to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kinde of Art and Philosophie of quarrell; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many no lesse ridiculous) some so mynsticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a slave; the other to a souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any such Italianated enemie in former times, I should willingly haue made with him such an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour to boot.

But lets examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiuing it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that giue it them, vse nothing so much in their conuersation and course of life, as to speake and sweare filly. Yea it is thereby, that they thrust and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed & sworne to pay the monies & other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them that are not Lyers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Iustice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein hee faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath beene made. Nay, what is the profession of loue that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice, and of all they haue, vsed in their ordinarie complements, and (in effect) to euery man whom they bid but good-morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wise French-man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Countie) une marche & complot fait ensemble se mocquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; A kinde of merchandise, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other: and so farre now-a-daies in fashion, and in vse, as he that vseth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference betwene these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are sometime periwaded by necessity vpon breach of promise; and those which meane out of cowardise and feare: the latter confilling themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most will-nous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subiect of all our deadly quarrells in effect: to it I say, That whosoever giueth another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all, neither ought it to be more haينously taken, than to tell him, hee hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promisseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that hee will performe it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that giues any man the Lie, when he himselfe knows that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not lied; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause haue I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's midnight; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; giues it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with an vtruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the vtruth is vttered:) but all that is rude, ought not to bee ciuillized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, that these discourtes fauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to feare God or Hell: whereas he that is truly wise, and truly valiant, knows that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall finde ten thousand seuen-penie-men (waged at that price in the wars) that feare it as little, or perchance lesse, than any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preseruer of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritie betwene doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyr empena: sic nec fortis empena; sed causa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoever shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as hee may iustly bee numbered among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe wee indeed take our owne reuenge, or punish the injuries offered vs, by the death of the inurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would be reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death vpon our owne consciences; Animas q; in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and bloud of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condonne in generous and noble spirits the defence of their honors, being prest with injuries: I say that I doe not, if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; do fauour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the Assailant. You will second⁴⁰ lie aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honor to satisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I answer that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrarie and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can iudge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-manguiues the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror; and the Lawes of God appointed the Deuill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England & other Christian Kings, haue seldome taken any such aduantage ouer men of quality; who vpon such termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble-men & Gentlemen in former ages, in all important injuries, sue vnto the King, to approue themselves by battaile and publike combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law; so did they decline to submit themselves vnto the shamefull reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it decreth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Theues: Nay

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders; Yet is not the Manslayer freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieved notwithstanding, that is, to require iustice by Grand Affize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further saith (for I vse his owne words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Manslayer) be conuicted either by Great Affize or by battaile, vpon that appeale; the Manslayer shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to iustice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men and Gentle-men shall be repaired in honor, where an enemy taking the start either in words or blowes, shall lay on them an infamie vnsofferable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily giue satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recouery of our Debts, Goods, & Lands, and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wiues, and children, are sustained, to the Iudges of the Law; because it may be felonnie, to take by violence euen that which is our owne: why should wee not submit our selues vnto the Iudges of honour in cases of honour; because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet againe it may be objected, That the losse of honour ought to bee much more fearful vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, or of our lands, or of our liues; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeed, and that which ought to be so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of historie, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publike good? In these he that is employed and trusted, if hee faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he leseth his honor. But the acting of a priuate combat, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a fruitlesse one, is not an action of vertue; because it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is difficult; because euen and equall in persons and armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrarie; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Commonweale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to saue euery mans fame and reputation, as farre as reputation may sustaine iniurie by words, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any euill words that wee haue giuen, and to confesse that wee haue done him wrong vnto whom wee haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that giues ill words in choller, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduisement; hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be giuen but to those that are feruile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monsieur de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sat: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe, and in his left hand the like cudgel or bastinado, where-with he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls (hauing formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to vse his owne discretion in the reuenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honor, who struck M. de Plessis, like a Ruffian coming behinde him, and hauing the aduantage of companie, and his horses readie) shifted himselfe away on the sodaine, but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner: or whether Monsieur de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre iust cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wise man iudge. To this if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission, that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntarie; and therefore no disgrace vnto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our finnes to God) makes allrepentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentlman and of an honest man. Nay, voluntarie repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weaknesse. Certainlie, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie injuries or soudaine injuries, that are not offered from malice forthought, than reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valor; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleue them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. Forhee that knowes himselfe indeed to be an honest man, comes to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preferred; we may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we doe submit our selues in all controversies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Cheualrie: in England, in France, and elsewhere, was no lesse charitable than politike. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth home-bees, as that of Bulls do, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Reuenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten vp of feuerall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wraoth of God vpon supreme Governours, than the permission.

His Maiestie therefore (which Hemrie the fourth of France also endeoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could neuer doe: in beating down, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for euer more. And we haue cause to hope, that history all care shall bee no lesse happy in preuenting the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outrageous vanitie of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their feuerall degrees. There is much difference betwene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and such pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former fort being excusable by weaknesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. Nolesse, if not more, difference there is, betwene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer be drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouer violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poysoning, and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betwene committing presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, prauily, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Maiesty now reigning, haue giuen notable testimony of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talar: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporte de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinal of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the hands of the Hangman. Queen Marie, vpon a noble man of her own Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Maiesty, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poyson, and of punishment following such wicked Artificians, euery Age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Author of the French Recherches giues vnto vs two notable instances: the one of des Elbars, who (saith Pasquiere) fit mourir Montaigne grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l'opinion de celay dont il estoit lors idolastre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut il fut pendu & estrangle; Who caused Montaigne great Master of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Elbars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man most nobly defended, and of great seruice. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of loue growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, he charged him with some offences which he had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good seruice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Mayssilles against the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publique triall. Hereupon the King (it being easie to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to question the Admirall life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, & of a large conscience, (which is not rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King, wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as albeit nothing could be proved against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Libertie; though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falshood in so great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle lecon certes (saith Pasquiere) tout Iudge pour demourer tousiours en soy, & ne laisser fléchir sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imagination fauue, qui pour fin de ieux se jette en mer; A faire lesson to all Iudges, to dwell alwaies in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float vpon the waves of imagination fauue, which in the end ouerwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue beene answered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vnderfered, That hee was tryed, according to his owne desire, by the Lawes of his Country, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings iustice, surmounting all other his passions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Estate.

The last Act of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is chosen Consul.

THE last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sicke, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettie Kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best to take the present advantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell vpon the Suessetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and wasted their Countrey. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Suero, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like distemper. They had not reaped such profit of their Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought easie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time serued very well, to enrich themselves with the spoile of the Countrey. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonels, that should haue bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellows, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Pmbes; to their Commanders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had bene liketo that, wherein Lucius Marcius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipios. But whilst they were deusing; what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected; there arriued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent vnto them from their General: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further ouer-shot themselves; led them to Carthage, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplarie iustice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deserved. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and Indibilis; Hee caused Albius and Atrius with some thirtie other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; Hee called the Mutiners to assembly; and hauing them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; he bitterly inueighed against them all as Traitors. This done, Albius, and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were halcd to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and receiued euery man his pay when hee was sworn.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue bene contented to bee quiet: but by the leuitie vsed to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in feare, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them: and sending Lelius with all his horse to fetch a compassse about the Hills, & charge them in rear; he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to persecue themselves and their estates, otherwise then by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yetso, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes then formerly they had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masaniissa; who secretly promised to do him all seruice, if the People of Rome would send him to make War in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spain alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gauls, and Ligurians, to ioyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without sparing either priuate men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, he landed at Carthage; hoping to haue taken it by surpris. But he failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned backe to repose himselfe a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoyle that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not suffer him againe to enter into their Citie. By this he foresaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vn courteous dealing, he assured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, hee followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain farewell for euer.

The Isle and Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Prouince, to those that were sent from Rome to succcede him therein: and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his coming to Rome he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bene granted vnto no Proconsul; excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custome of those times, go farre fro the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cesar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were stayed by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of los in the diuision of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so farre off.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtains leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Masaniissa who was ioynd with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syphax.

P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should bee allowed, to bestow part of the money which hee had brought out of Spain into the treasury; vpon the setting forth of solemne plaies, that he had vowed to make, whilst hee was busied in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reuiue the memorie of his victories already gotten; and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which hee intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassadors auail much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deservingly, saying, That they were the most happy of all their Countreins, since they being present, had seene him chosen Consul, and should carry home such joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadors were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though costly it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well deserved. Neuertheless, when Scipio propoed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince: there wanted not many, euen of the principall men, that vehemently gaine said him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who seemes to haue bene troubled with that disease; which too often causeth men renowned for long approoued vertue, to looke asquint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasury was vnable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure bee recalled vnto the defence of Rome it selfe, if need required. Hereunto hee added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul; which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from enemies, then it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spanish warres, as of lesse moment than the intended voyage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing suffered Asdrubal to passe into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which hee viued, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be thar yere a Prouince: which the Consul neuertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of money, with leues made abroad. As for the care of Italie, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise; he propoed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much alteration there was about the manner of his proceeding: for asmuch as it was noyled abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reuened in this honourable man a little spice of that arrogance, which in following ages, grew to bee much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleasure; whereby he obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicill might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to passe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, coming on the suddaine from the Baleares to Genoa, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italy, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. Hee could not indeed raise any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that hee found them distracted with ciuill warres. Therefore hee was driuen to make choise of his partie; and to helpe those whom he thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublefome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly haue passed; yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vnto the Gauls, redie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay ready to be employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Magno. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet either coming to his ayde from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) laden with the booty that he had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much dislike him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, hartning him in his proceedings; yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voice of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him bee recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue bene pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Iuno Lacina, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike and Grecke letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamblers that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the fame for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A 20 great pestilence, infecting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to haue bene the occasion of this yeeres idleness, which fell out not much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was maruailously empowred by this warre; and had already tried the vnmolt way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the Citie might receiue no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to make preffe of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is vually found in Councils of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carrie all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne iudgements, to the wisdom that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that repoth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe deceived: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the busines, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne olde in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from diuers parts of Italie about seuen thousand Voluntaries. Hee had also prouision from the leuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canas for sailes, Axes, Beede-hookes, Hand-milles, and thelike implements, Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmetts, & Spears of all kindes: euery place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afford.

Vnto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compass of fiftie and fortie dayes, he had both sold his Timber, built, and lanced twentie Triremes, and ten Quinqueremes Gallies; wherewith he transported his Armie into Sicill. In Sicill hee found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Cannae: which were olde Souldiers, and (as he himselfe well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauy censure. They had serued vnder Marcellus and Laelius, at the taking of many Cities, and strong places: in which regard, they were like to be of good vnto him in Africke, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthie young men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment: but with condition that they should deliuer their Horse and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilst he was prouiding, to haue things in a readines for Africke, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri (for there were two in the Towne) being take prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransom'd, & rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surpris'd. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garriso, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their owne paucitie should make them too weak for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consull Scipio. The Townesmen were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclinining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians vnto the Roman Senate; not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Plinius the Captaine, who giue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies: in the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoyled by these barbarous Thecues. The Locrians therefore aduised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had neuer bene committed, without notorious reuenge by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good care to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the iniuries done vnto them; sent for Plinius, with other principal offenders, whom they cast into prison, and vsed according to their deserts: as also they restored vnto Proserpina her money twice told. But olde Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. Hee laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharpe inuention that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissolutenesse of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicill, neither mindfull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were to farre vrged, that tenne Legates were sent ouer into Sicill, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Aediles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his iourney, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employ'd Laelius in Africke; rather to make discouerie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. Hee tooke a great bootie: and strucke no litle terror into the Carthaginians; who saw their affaires to be vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his iourney was. That speaking with Masaniissa, he well informed himselfe of the state of Africke, and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to ioyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masaniissa's revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made vnder-hand with the Romans: Liue doth professe, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferior to Liue, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason to probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Onely the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe; that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Liue, if it had bene true: vntill we should beleuee, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoever it was, thus Appian tells it: and many circumstances of things done, confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masaniissa loved. Masaniissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to be his sonne-in-law.

When

When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, hee went into Spaine, and there did greater fauour. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubal daughter to be a matter of State : and bestowed her vpon Sphax; without flanding to acquaint her father or Masaniſſa therewithall. This they did, for that Sphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masaniſſa was aduertised : and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as hee thought ; yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it : which would haue cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conueighed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may belecue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Onely it seemes, that howsoeuer Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians vnto Sphax; yet since this their courtesie proceeded from feare, Hee thought it wike doome to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Luiue, and from Polybius, whom (as appeares by the broken peeces of his works remaining) Liuius did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Masaniſſa was the ſonne of Gala, a King of the Namidians: whoſe father dying, the Crown deſcended by order of the Country, vnto Deſales the brother, not vnto Masaniſſa the ſonne. But this Vncle of Masaniſſa thorowly dyed and his elder ſonne, who tooke poſſeſſion of the Kingdome, was vanquiſhed, and ſlaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himſelfe Protector ouer the younger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himſelfe againſt Masaniſſa, whoſe returne hee feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not ſerue: Hee, and his Pupill, were diſpoſſeſſed of their Eſtates by Masaniſſa, that was a ſkilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reaſon ſhould haue bene glad, that Masaniſſa, who had done them notable ſeruiſe, was thus confirmed in his Eſtate: had they not bene gilty of the iniurie by them done vnto him; whilſt his Vncle or Couſin reigned, and he ſeemed unlikely to ſtand them in any ſtead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne falſe towards his Couſinall, warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheleſſe Masaniſſa ſtill retained the hearts of his people: and thereby remained ſtrong enough, to infeſt both Syphax and the Carthaginians: though hee was often put in diſtreſſe, by great forces that were ſent againſt him. He therefore keeping much about the leſſer Syria, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet ſo, as he made long roades ouer all the Country, euen as farre as to Hippo, and when Laſius arriued thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to haſten on Scipio to the inuallion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good success, than could be expected from the good will of poore Mafaniffa : sent an Embassage into Scitola about the same time, which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excused himselfe of his promise lately made : and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians ; adding, That he could not chooseth but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein hee was borne and reigned ; and for the defence of his beloved wiues Countrey, if it were invaded. Netherlesse he promised to remaine a Neutro so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perswasion could haue done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprize ; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Adventurers. Left therefore the saying of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion, He thought it the best way to prevent all discourse, and set the warre vnder take immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King : wherein he willed him to consider, that what hee had promised, hee had also sworn ; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having sent them away, He called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voyage ; which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, saide hee, Mafaniffa hath bene with Leluts : and Syphax hath newly sent to me ; greatly wondering upon what I should thus flay ; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else haue bene made concerning the message of these Embassadors; whose followers had bene seene walking vp and downe Syracuse. And left any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the businesse, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet vnto Lilybeum: and requesting by letters

M. Pomponius, that was Pretor in Sicily, to meete him there; halted thither with his Armie. As Lilybeum he agreed with the Pretor, about the diuision of the Legions between them; which to leaue behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carry with him into Africke. What numbers he transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning onely ten thousand foot, and two and twentie hundred horse; others increasing them to foure and thirtie thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embalming, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them down: since they were points of ordinat care, and which it is like that neither hee, when hee tooke his voyage into Spain, nor others vpon like occasions, haue omitted; they being also word for word set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Liuius, and fitted

them to a Prince of later age.
This Roman Armie landed in Africke, neere to a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie; which how faire it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compass, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masaniussa vnto Scipio at his first arrivall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander who thinks the faire Promontorie to haue bene the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficultie Masaniussa might come thither fro the lesser Syrta, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment soone after his arrivall, Scipio encamped beyond Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proved; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, six hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masaniussa, that routed about the Countrey with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farr from the place to the which hee vially retired, like as before hee had met with Lellius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would haue bene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer-come the trouble of a long iourney, and fetch a great compass to Vtica, by Land; when hee might haue disembarked neerer vnto it. Neuerthelesse it may passe as a con-30 clusion, That Scipio came chiefe of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syrta, since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilibeum, to shipe their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for 40 sustenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masaniussa had signified vnto Lellius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howeouer they made braue promises, would 50 not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Army to bee such, as not onely suited to invade the Lands of Carthage, but thrained a conquest of the Citie, and whole Situate: then might hee better aduise them to set sayle for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

make warre upon the Enemies at their owne doores. The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were lewied, or to be lewied in Sicily. Afterward the sonne of Gisco, the same that had lately bene chased out of Spain by Hanno, and his selfe man of warre. And good enough perhaps hee was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passeable. He was then with the King his son in law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax & to him, informing them of the Inuasion: the one of them to giue assistance, and commanding the other to make his remeate into the Citie, where he was chosen General. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which hee consigned aboard his Hulks of ships of burden, and sent them backe laden into Sicil. He rooke likewise a Towne called Sale, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numidian horse: whose seruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceiue the vnskillfulness of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Masaniissa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a brauado, trained out the improuident Hanno so farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or slaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the towne, which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a City of great importance, * of which mention had bene formerly made, and late done before it. Forty dayes he spent about it, assaying it both by Land and Sea, and vying all his engines of battery whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of preuayling. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to chosse a place, and fortifie his Winter-Campe, which must be well stored against the yeare following. Whilest thus necessity vrged him to leaue Vtica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gae him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the siege. Asdrubal had made a Levie of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Army to draw neare vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse: which ioyning vnto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio, who thereby tooke occasion to dis-lodge. He chole for his Winter-campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot men hee lodged on a Promontorie, ioyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men hee bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other shoare: in the bottome of the Creeke he moored his ships, and there he quartered the mariners, with all that belonged vnto the Fleet. The whole campe he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the yeare, when it should serue him againe to fight. Of cattails and other bootie Masaniissa had brought in great store, by driving the Country, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Come also hee had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise a parrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The shippes that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could best spare, especially with captiues to be sold for slaues. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neare vnto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the seure institution, which the Romans vsed in the discipline of warre, or for that they presumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew neare, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps hee might be wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen proofe before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing worried himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp: and being peraduenture no lesse weary with satiety of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: he might be moued with a little entreatie to with-draw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that such a friend as this King, had bene highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was neare at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had bene invited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe a while: his wife Queene Sophoniba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoever it were, Syphax did onely make an oerture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Affricke, and so make an end of the warre: wherewith now both Affricke and Europe were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first giue care: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadors; he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the King, That the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cab-

bins, and couered with boughes: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed coverings of Mattes and Reedes; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carelessly without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee bothought himselfe, That it would be no hard for him to fetter their camps on fire, and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, he fore-saw that it would be a worke of great difficulty for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Country wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought vpon the matter; the more needfull hee found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end hee sent many Embassadors, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surprize. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many olde Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandering (as it were) idly vp and downe the Campe, might obscure the wayes and entrances, with whatsoeuer else was needefull. When he had learned as much as he desired: vpon the sudden hee sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre, without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe, was no more, than the good will of one man. This hee did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very peniue; as hauing lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his Campe, and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe, they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did Marcus Attilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him; which they themselves were well able to doe by land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves, recompencing (in concept) the losse of their hopes past, with that of victory to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was no idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appoynted to take the same peece of ground, whereon he lay against Vtica before. This hee did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting vpon the few, that he purposed to leaue behinde him in his Campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well, and beimes; that they might be ready for the journey. After supper, hee appoynted such Companies as hee thought fit, to the defence of his Campe; all the rest of the army he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seauen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his army, the other halfe he committed to Lelius and Masaniissa, whom hee sent before him to set vpon the campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualty vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the camp of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and giue Syphax warning to look to himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and softly; that Lelius and Masaniissa, who had a longer iourney, and were to fetch a compass about for feare of being discouered, might haue time to get before him, & do their feat. It was about two or three of the clocke in the morning, when the campe of Syphax began to blaze: which not onely the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed vnto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betwene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe, and others, that had fallen vp late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were, nor giue any remedie to the mischance, as it burden, and sent them backe loaden into Sicil. He tooke likewise a Towne called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numidian horse: whose service being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceiue the vnskillfulness of their Leader, that had thus housed them. was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell upon the enemies sword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Masaniſſa, that best knew the Country, did great execution upon them; having layd all the wayes, by which hee foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying onely what would serve to quench the fire. Others ranne up to the Rampart: where, fearelesse of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out as Scipio would have it. He therefore lost no time: but setting upon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest backe into their campe, which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but shifted onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had bene taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have bene sayd, that with lesse than one halfe of thirty thousand men, hee might at least have given some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling these fires, had he not bene onely careful how to save his owne fearefull head. Nevertheless,

Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to have bene true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would have striven to shew valour, when the Campe was once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good, because of the tumult and confutation. I shall not need to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirmes) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape, which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their severall wayes of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the darke: but they were not many, as after shall appeare. Surely it must needs have bene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Luie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seeme to have followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting up the summe. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to have escaped; forty thousand to have perished by sword or fire, and above sixe thousand to have bene taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of foure score and thirtene thousand, which were in these two Campes.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next towne that was very strongly fortified, thought thereto finde the Romans wicke, untill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repaire their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, & five hundred horse: which hee thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Towne-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeelde. Unto this disputation, he well foresaw, that the arrivall of Scipio would soone give an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold upon him, and seeke the Victors favour by delivring him up, he shrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the towne, which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming: and thereby preserved it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adjoining would needs be valiant, and make countenance of warre: but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio, who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This being done, hee returned to the siege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason; when, instead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make hastie provision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them saw any means. Some gave aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to send for Hannibal out of Italie; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Army, they might yet defend defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, leavyn in all haste an other Army; and sending Embassadors to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Alba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their infortunate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was employed to make new levies of men: and Queene Sophoniba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax; who having gathered together as many as he could of his subiects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne kingdom. Sophoniba laboured so with her husband, that at length the wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, who to the Carthaginians, were brought over to serve in Africke. Of these were made such braue reports, as if their courage, and the armes which they used, were not to be resisted. Even the multitude within Carthage beleaved these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole country of Spain had bene twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales pleased much: which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lie, saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty dayes they made up an Army, consisting well-near of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called The Great Fields, about five dayes journey from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leaving behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Army, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now bene time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else, it was not in his power to give such directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battle: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, having their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masaniſſa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the battaile. The victory was gotten without many blowes: for the vntaynd followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not flye the first charge of the Italians, or of Masaniſſa. Onely the Spaniards fought along time, even untill they were all in a manner slaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thus come over to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them, than upon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne kingdom: whether his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, having thus gotten the mastery of the field, took counsaile about the prosecution of the warre. It was resolved upon as the best course, That he himselfe, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masaniſſa, with his Numidians, and Lelius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdom, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice, it seemed that Masaniſſa gave: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne kingdom, vntoed by Syphax: which to accomplish it, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Lelius was sent away with Masaniſſa: and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the warre from towne to towne. Many places yeelded for feare; many were taken by force; and all the subiects of Carthage waunted in their fidelity; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those unreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had layd upon them for maintenance of the warre in Spain and Italy. What to do in this case the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was their Enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subiects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheless of their owne free will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embassadors should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gave aduice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio; that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: vpon the safety whereof they laid all depended: adding, that whilst they were true, and at vniue among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsels were not reiected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuerthelesse, it was considered, that hereby they should only protract the warre, without any aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Vtica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come ouer into Affricke, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the towne: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appoynted therunto, forthwith to embarque themselves for Italia.

In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a Citie in those dayes very strong, and standing in prospect almost of uery part of Carthage. This place, or rather more defensible peere adioyning, he easily tooke, the garrison forsaking it, and running away as soone as he drew neare. But whilst he was about thereto in campe, and fortifie himselfe against the City, he might perceiue the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceiued, and stood in great feare, lest his owne ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heauily laden with engines of battery, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most conuenient for assaulting the towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall seruice. Wherefore he hied away towards Vtica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should haue come too late. Neither could he indeede haue bene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vied such diligence as was conuenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they turned a while to make a brauado, presenting themselves in order of battell, as if the Romans would haue put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: he thought it would be sufficient, if he could preferre his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea; it should little auale the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one be hinde another, made a foure-fold bridge ouer the Channell of the Hauens; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might runne out and backe againe vpon any aduantage or need: but these he couered with planks, vnder the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to ioyn them together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauens. The fight betwene them and the Romans that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood vpon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their gallies, that were lower and vnsteady, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, aduancing forth from behind the Bridge, were greatly ouer-borne by the force of the gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before, for feare of hurting these their friends, that were intangled & mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw vpon the masts & yards which serued as arches to ioyn the bridge together: then rowing

ing backwards, they tore all asunder, in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to saue themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vnouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but hauing haled away fixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauens, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater than their victory: because among so many grieuous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilst things thus passed about Carthage, Lelius and Masaniissa, in their journey against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masaniissa to his kingdom, without further contention: the Masaniissa his subiects, joyfully receiuing him, and forsaking the vsurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore, being solicited by Afarbal and Sophonisba, he prepared againe for warre. But beside the instigation of his beloved wife, the losse of the Masaniissa would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lelius and Masaniissa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession, be the title vnto some part neuer to vniuit. Hercunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that shee had vomited vp her owne guts, when it was onely the garbage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleued the Kingdom of the Masaniissa to be part of his entrails: Lelius and Masaniissa will shortly giue him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farr. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had bene conuerted into strong enmity; as also for in his place another, who might doe them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masaniissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, vnto this day, though there be many strong townes, yet the fortune of a battell is enough, to translate the kingdom from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no less an Army, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long agoe sent vnto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered vp in haste: and few of them had seen warre before. Encamping nere vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troups of horse on both sides, encountred one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: so that at length Syphax, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foyle at their first meeting with the Enemy, came vp with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith ouer-charged Masaniissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilst he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman squadrons of Foot came against him: though their owne Troupes of horse, which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their battaile standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though he laboured much in vaine, to make them giue ground. Masaniissa likewise, and his Troupes grew confident vpon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to giue backe. Herewithall the Legions came in fight: which terrified the Numidian horse, that they beganne presently to dis-band. Faine would Syphax haue stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnhalpally, that hee was cast from his horse, which receiued a wound, and was taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsooke the place, and fled, and that their king, vpon whom all depended, was in the Roman hand. Masaniissa told Lelius, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian warre, if presently they hasted away to Cirta the chiefe city of the kingdom; whither he himselfe desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax, along with him. Hereto Laelus agreed. Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the City to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but especially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he pteuayled so farre, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one stroue to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest Queen Sophonisba yielded herselfe into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that she might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suite, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Laelus and Scipio from determining other wise of her, since there was his wife. But Laelus, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously, so that at first he would haue haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-increased by Masanissa, he suffered the matter to rest, whileas he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other captiues immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needfull in the kingdome.

At the coming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, unimisting to euery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not onely to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, unprouoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, That Masanissa was no wiser than himselfe, since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this peillous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masanissa and Laelus came vnto him: both of whom together he louingly welcomed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had title to her herd, and that she was a mischieuous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to detract the memory of his great seruices already done; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio, whom he neuertheless entreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that she should not be deliuered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after sometime spent in agny, he called vnto him a seruant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes vsed then to haue in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them vniuiling to liue:) and terpering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this message, That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should procure her from falling aliae into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, she onely sayd; That if her husband had not better token to send vnto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might haue dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funerall. And herewithall she oldely dranke off the poyson. Thus Linie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it downe agreeably to that which hath bene spoken before, concerning the precontract betwene Masanissa and Sophonisba. He sayth, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Laelus and Masanissa vpon their way thither, yeelding vp their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne private, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse, and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had receiued information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage, he fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanissa sayd, she was was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her, wherein he should haue no wrong. Herewithall he sent to fetch her away: and Masanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliuer her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gaue vnto her a cup of poyson, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should haue apprehended her. So he shewed vnto the Romans her dead body, which he royally intured. The sudden violence of Masanissa's loue, and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marry with him: added not so much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other euident cause (which Linie notes) of the sudden filling out betwene him and the Carthaginians, vnder whom he had bin trained vp, and done them great seruice. Howsoever it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholy should leade him to some inconuenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserued of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gaue vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeede the ready way to diuert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, vnto the more chearefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to smile vpon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took vpon them to create or proclaime a King. Which honour though Masanissa well deserued: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither should he haue bene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax's his dominions. It seemeth not unlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his troupe of horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans, he might neuertheless haue recovered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne subjects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice bene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his kingdome, it was not more than he deserued: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they haue wished after opportunity, than of such a man, vpon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masafli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politicke sort of grauitie, tooke highly vpon them; as it euen their saluting him by the name of King, had bene a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermin the sonne of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speake more) which held some peece of his fathers kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all means to deserue their loue, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of suite: yet the Roman Senate was punctilious herein, and answered very grauely, That it was not their custome to giue the honour of that appellation, due onely vnto such Kings, as had greatly deserued of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; & in proceesse of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the salutation by that name, though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or profit thence redounding.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians desire Truce, and breake it.

THE Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallen their good friend Syphax; and vnderstood that Masanissa their immortall enemy, had got possession of his kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begunne at his last being there. The Carthaginians

nians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth vnto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the citie, which were their Priuy Councell, to make suite for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the "feet of him, and of those that sat in Councell with him.

Excerpt. 2. Po.
lib. lib. 15.
Law. lib. 30.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have vnjustly broken the Peace betweene them and Rome; and to haue deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, where to all men are subiect, they would shew mercy vnto the City of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of other Citizens, had now twice deferred to be ouerthrowne. Herewithal they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appointment had beguene the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appeares, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired worke in hand, of suing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men ouer those that were subiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made such adoration to the Romans, in their owne necessity; vnlesse they themselves had expected the like, where they had the aduantage.

It was not vnknowne to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poore case the city of Rome then was; and how vnable to defray the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately bene. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome, and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrustful the walles of Carthage, though Pistica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and tolde them, That though he came into Africke, to make a conquest, and not a Peace: yet hauing the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations vnderstand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Iustice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these: That they should render vp vnto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitive slaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaulle: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland betwene Italie and Africke: That they should deliuer vp all their shippes of warre, saue twentie; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gaue them three dayes: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masaniissa was dismissed, and went home into his kingdome, as if the warre had bene already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Laelius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy, and gaue hope, that the long-endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were fetopen, and an holy day appointed for thanksgiving and supplication to their gods. Laelius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masaniissa: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African warre, and giuing thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subiects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed vpon him, who by rendering them to liberty, should doe an acte very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behind with Masaniissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should doe for him, they called him King againe, released his Numidians that were captiues; and sent him two purple Cassocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other Presents, as in time of their pouerty might serue to testifie their good will. Scarcely were these and Laelius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors

were not admitted into the citie, but were lodged without: vnill Laelius being sent for, came backe from Ofisia, to be present when their demands wereto be heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of B. Vnna; that stood in the Suburbs. The crand of these Embassadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City, was one lyto winne time, and get respite for warre; vnill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italie, either to chace the Romans out of Africke, or to obtaine peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betwene them and Lucretius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remaine in force: neither had there since bene any warre at all, betwene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any lease from Carthage, had of his owne head besieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that aduentured in like sort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force, as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a jeast of a warre, that had bene so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Lucretius, and other passages following betwene the two Cities. But they excused themselves by their age: (for they were all yong men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gaine time, vnill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Laelius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, wee finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiuing aduertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed betwene him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gaue him licence to creupon, to proceede vnto conclusion. This may with good reason be belieued, since it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rife vpon the most vn certaine issue of one battell betwene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be auerse to them, their forces in Africke were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came backe from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred shippes of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africke, to victuall the Roman Campe, was ouer-taken by foule weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wrecke, was dispersed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as wee finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuall in Carthage, which caused the people to crie out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them; saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to their owne greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage vnderstood (as it seemes) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than mere mockery, and therefore cared not for obseruation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women and boyes, to be meddling in vproaires, the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out vnder Asdrubal, to gather vp the dispersed Roman shippes of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recovered the station whereto their campe adioyned) and bring them into Carthage, which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby relieved; but for that by this breach of Truce, he fore-saw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the warre, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors vnto them, both to require satisfaction for the injury done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; vpon those conditions which he had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, & kissed our feet, after an vn-usuall manner of humilitie, confessing your selues to haue perfidiously broken the League that was betwene vs, and thereby to haue deserued such punishment as is due vnto Rebels; should so soone forget what ye then vttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your selues worthy to be destroyed, hauing only recourse vnto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that ye should consider, how long hee hath bin pent vp in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner besieged, and vnable to stirre: so that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Affricke, and ready to giue vs battaile: yet should it well agree with your wisdome, to doubt what might befall; remembering that he is a man, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge haue ye left vnto your selues against heereafter? What gods will ye either sweare by, to be belieued, or call vpon in your misery? What words, or lamentable gesture will ye henceforth vse, to moue compassion? Surely ye haue already wasted all your force of perswasion, and shall not againe deuiue vs, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves vpbraid with the base demeanor of their Embassadors. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by them: but they thought it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that the Roman Embassadors were very much delighted, in the rehearfall of that point which was yielded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iustice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased, either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calles Hanno the Great; or by the very reverence, due vnto the place of those that had vttered such liberal words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two Gallies appointed for their safe conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage, towards Nica. He, whether onely desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publique order to cut off these Embassadors in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the riuer Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had bene then in safety, since the Roman Campe was euen in sight. The Embassadors tooke this in ill part, not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them, in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose, which was to haue stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquere, that had more banks of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal, they slipped away, and made him ouer-shoot himselfe. Yet hee gaue them chase; and had well-near surprised them. But they discouered some Roman Companies on the shoare ouer against them, and therefore aduentured to runne their vessell aground: whereby they saved their owne liues, though a great part of their company were slaine, or hurt. This practise of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonorable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driven to studie nothing else, than how to get the victory, as hauing none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suite for peace, would also haue caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatic: had they not bene giuen to vnderstand, that Hannibal was already landed in Affricke, in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

in what sort Hannibal spent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doing of Mago in Italie. Hannibal called out of Italie. How the Romans were diuersly affected by Hannibals departure.

Ever since the losse of first battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded vnto Claudius and Linius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slaine, were contented to be quiet all their yeere. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthe of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Consul who followed Licinius, and Cn. Seruilius Cæpio, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to haue done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemie was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Affricke, wherein they were at no small charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happy conclusion. They stood nevertheless in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paines among the Ligurians and Gaules to raise an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that begonne to waxe cold. Mago solicited also the Hæturians, and found therein so ready to stirre in his behelpe, that if he could haue entered their Countrey strong, it might haue proued no lesse needfull for Scipio to resume home out of Affricke, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Hæturians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrey of the Insabrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe worthe of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull, in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to haue shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout: and strained themselves hard, as if at that brunt the victory should haue bene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the seruice of those beasts being fitter for such like, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more auilible against those that were loose, than against the Troupes that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shower of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest to giue backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy, that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which hee had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, hee put himselfe in the head of his Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length hee received a grievous wound in his thigh; wherof shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men:

men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Praetors Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides diuers Colonels, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hote peece of seruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit: How euer it were, this victorie would haue much imported for the assurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himselfe (by easie iournies, because of his wound) to into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both hee and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthage it selfe was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarked shortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were readie to burst out, whilest the Embassadors were deliuering their errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yet to plain dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their best to haile me out of Italie; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled me to manage the Warre heere. Scipio therefore shall not need to bragge, that he hath drawne me home by the becles: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the House of the Barchines, for lacke of other means to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that, which after came to passe: wherein he embarked, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunk backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as he could take he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lucina, to which had been held an inuiolable Sanctuarie vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no lesse passionate, then men are wont to be, when they leaue their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that hee had not led his Armie from Canna, horte and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the Walls of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had liued almost halfe his time.

If it could haue bene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding ioy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouer thither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holliday was appointed for thanksgiving vnto their gods; and extraordinary great sacrifices publicly made, for ioy of such happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had bene troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his owne Countie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remoue of the war from their owne doores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to makethem presume further, than at other times they would haue done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great masse of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred backe vnto the Saguntines that had surpris'd it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had bene borrowed in time of more necessitie from private men. Hence also proceeded the seuerer chastisement, laid vpon those 12. Colonies, that for want either of means, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had had bene wont to set out for the Warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the vertie most of their abilitie. So confident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet satiable to the greatnesse of their spirit) vpon the good successe of the battell at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more neerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italie had bene few daies since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would bee found a true Prophet. For be thinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax & Asdrubal no specialty of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were eyther of those two. The Numidian King had bene wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe-scollions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a fit Captaine for such Souldiors. Likewise Asdrubal the sonne of Gislo, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at sauing himselfe by a swift retreat. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, steeled many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoyle, not onely of good souldiors, but of braue Captaine, by them slaine. Such talke vied the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battell, with many that had slaine Roman Praetors, yeas and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had been first in getting ouer the Trenches of severall Romane Campes, or in winning the tops of walls at the siege of Townes; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Armie, as good as euer had seru'd in warre, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in ruine; loseth a battell at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal disembarked his Armie at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercure, and somewhat more then one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as hee did, somewhat farr from the Enemy; that hee might furnish himselfe of these and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battell. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the Inland Countie, gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horses of seruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should be easie for Masaniissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppress both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that vied it, prevailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginians two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mezetellus, (the same who had made himselfe Protector ouer Masaniissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and aduersie to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermina the son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the same time to assaile the places that yielded obedience to Masaniissa. This Vermina, as we finde in Leuit, came with more than 16. thousand men (for hee lost more than so many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the lesse of those preparations, which would haue made the victorie assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Aids: it offended them to thinke, that they had bene so base as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for peace; whilest they had such a braue Champion alieue, to maintaine their cause by Warre. But when as they be thought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Romane magnanimity to endure them, them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad: and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was General of their forces, Hee thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuerthelesse, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his Embassadors: and the news of Hannibal his being landed in Affricke, made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee lent vnto Masaniſſa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businesse a-part. Tenne Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masaniſſa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him seruice in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well vnderstood, that those and many more besides all his owne forces would but little auail him; if Hannibal should driue the Romans out of Affricke. Wherefore taking such order as he could vpon the sudden, for the safetie of his owne Kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and fixe thousand Foot, he made all haste vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lelius and Fulvius: who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and vnderstood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaued themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such torious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion:

M. Babin one of the late Embassadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands vpon them and detained them; sending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrie, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyne, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to hear of this; & commanded Babin to vse them with all possible courteisie, & send them safe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; & caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great victorie) far lesse honourable then the Romans. This notwithstanding, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to sacke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Towne by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to doe, they vsed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies asunder, as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practise at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no pece of cruelty, when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengful mindes, for the iniuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discouer where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, & brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trusting them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleasure; appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This done, He gaue them leaue to depart; and sent them away safe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderstanding this, admired the brauery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personall conference, and signified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that Hee would meet him shortly in a place convenient. The next day Masaniſſa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remoued vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neere vnto which he sat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence hee sent word vnto the Carthaginians, That the time and place did fully serue, if He had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, & came within foure miles of the Enemy: where he encamped well to his own good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driuen to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generalls, each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well searched, for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had bene better both for Carthage and Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Affricke & of Italie, for that the Countreies of Sicill and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had bene lost, and of so much blood as had bene shedde, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to confider, vnto what extreame dangers their owne Cities had bene exposed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition Hee affirmed that his owne yeres, and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared; that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his minde vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are subiect. Yet (said hee) mine owne example may peradventure suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my victorie at Canne, wonne the greatest part of Italie: and denied with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome; which I hoped verily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand before entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes instability. I haue sought with thy father, Scipio: Hee was the first of the Roman Generalls, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke, that the time would come, that I should haue such businesse, as now at the present, with his sonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Paganes, wherof shee hath many. And thou maist haue experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how soone? Thinke vpon M. Attilius. If he would haue bearkened vnto such perswasions, as I now vse to thee; he might haue returned home to Rome an happy man. And so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will giue thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicill, Sardinia, and whatsoever Islands else are situate betweene Italie and Affricke, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for euer; and left vnto the Romans, to beare Dominion thereunto? Thou shalt haue glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for vs: our owne quiett shall henceforth giue vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully obserue the peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must vndergoe for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maist haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold vpon good Fortune, if it please thee: stay but vntill to morrow night; and thou must take such fortune, as it please the gods. The issue of battaile is vncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steele wee shall each of vs bring into the field: bus of the victorie, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more ado, make peace. And doe not tell me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours deal fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is I Hannibal that now desire peace with thee, which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrie. And thinking it expedient, I will at all times maintaine it: like as I haue maintained vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie me, the Warre by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicill and in Spaine which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the defence of the Minervines; and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on their armes, which the gods by the final issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to be most iust. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune, he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence, or overweening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plain, that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already wonne from the Romans? If, said He, these Conditions had bene propounded whilst as yet ye detained some part of Italic, they might peradventure not have bene refused. But as the safe now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit unto you any one piece of these my former demands, to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the injuries which they have done me since, have made them unworthy of obtaining peace upon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they to are by thy means eased. Only thou must thinke, that in like sort it concerns me in honour, not to let them be gainers or losers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto us ransom-free, all prisoners that they have of ours; to pay us five thousand Talents; to deliver up their Gallies; and to deliver hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce, their spying of our Fleet, and their violating our Embassadors? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done: then will I take advice with my Councell what answer to give you; otherwise, you may each prepare for warre, and blame your own selves, for that I have denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other news than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betwene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the field: a noble march, and such as hath very seldom beene found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, divided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betwene them: Not farre behinde these followed the Principes, likewise divided, and so after the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite unto the void spaces betwene the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was vsuall, might fall backe betwene the Principes; but he placed them directly one behinde another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was left, whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betwene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or thole of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, hee gaue direction, that when they found themselves to be ouer-charged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betwene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armie; there by leaving room enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to save themselves on the voyde ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battalies, without cloying vp the way betwene the Maniples, which hee desired to keepe open. His Italian horse he placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masaniissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly, vsing words, not many, but forcible. He bade them remember what they had achieved, since their coming into Africke. He tolde them, that if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victory in this warre, should make them Lords of all the world; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would flee. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neither was there any place in Africke, that would giue them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: vntill they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercifull Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable hereunto, haue neuer bene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than foure score, in Front

Front of his Battaile. Next behind these, he made his Vanguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Baleares and Moorcs. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interested in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries, though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More then the space of a furlong behinde these came his Reward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom hee reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lelius, in his owne right wing hee bestowd the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masaniissa. He was indeed farre too weake for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tycheus and Menezellus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the 4. thousand of Masaniissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be leuied in the haste of a few dayes, and the remainder of those, that had of late bene often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authority, to make these his companions alight and serue on foote, setting better men in their saddles. All that hee could haue done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the Sonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteen thousand and vppwards, it e most of them Horse, the advantage of number might haue serued well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers, whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their severall conditions: promising vnto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards: threatening the Carthaginians with incurable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies, and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Cannæ. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; euen such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundry battalies, could no longer bee trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countrey. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continuall feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chased. Wherefore hee entreated these his olde companions, vpon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strue to make good their honour, and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations vied the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew nere together, the Numidian Horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romanes. Of these Elephants (as they were alwayes an vncertaine kind of helpe) those that stood nere vnto the point of the left wing, turned backe for feare: and ranne vpon their owne Numidian Horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Masaniissa cloying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians, and not suffering them to rally themselves, drave them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces betwene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselves, which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Diuers of them receiuing many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned: but ranne backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lelius the same advantage, that Masaniissa had against the Numidians; which he vied in like sort. In the meane while, the battalies of foote aduanced, and drew nere together with a slow and watery pace, till they were almost within a weapons call: at what time they gaue a shout, and ranne one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacity, and in quicknesse, to haue the better of the Romanes; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they took. But the Roman discipline after a while, prevailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hastati, encouraged their fellows; and shewed themselves ready, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leued Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired souldiers giue backe, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to thinke themselves betrayed: whereupon they inclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaille was herewith more terrified then before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as to they thought, by their owne fellows, to turne their Armes with an headlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beate downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Romane Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of worke, that the Principes were faine to come vnto them, and helpe to ouer-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindring one another, could neither fight, nor easily fle. Such of them as escaped, ranse towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or saue these Run-aways. Hee caused his men to bend their Pikes at thosk of his owne side, that would haue rushed vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaille, and saue themselves in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was covered with heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slipperie with blood: that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should bee dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if hee should fight with that warlike Armie, which hee saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well assured to receive a notable overthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the maine battaille of the Hannibalsians. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triarii: He placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he aduanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer he had bene receiued in his life before. All the daies worke till now, seemed to haue bene a matter of pastime, in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were also farr the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obdurate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather choseto die on the ground, whercon hee stood. So that, after a long time, it was vn certaine which part had the worke: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of Masaniassa and Laelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to haue bene most happy and in a needfull time. These vpon a sudden charged the Hannibalsians in Rete; and ouer-bearing them by mere violence, compelled them too fall Rout.

In this Battaille there died of the Romans fifteene hundred and vppwards: on the Carthaginian side, about twenty thousand, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captaine of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polibius; and was acknowledged, as Luue reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enioyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage to take battaille with such disadvantage, hee could worke no marvels. Hee saued himselfe with a few Horse, and stayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage, from which he had bene absent fixe and thirtie yeeres. At his comming into the Senate He said plainly That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten: Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolved to send Embassadors againe; and try the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this this Fleet, and that which he had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions nee committed vnto Cn. Octavius, whom hee willed to meete him there by land. Then sending Laelius away to Rome with newes of the victory, He set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by tenne Embassadors from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, began to vse the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answere, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would giue them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in braue-ry than with meaning to attempt it, He returned backe to Vtica, and called backe Octavius thither, with whom in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the newes, that Perminus the sonne of Syphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse then Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Perminus seemed to haue bene both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defectiue in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not only beate him, but so compasse him in, that he hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leauing fiftene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had bene with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should haue bene farr better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginians lost, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great access vnto the former, yet strud wd to dunt the Carthaginians, & imprint in the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadors from Carthage: whose behaviour though it was more pitifull than it had bin before, yet procured it lesse commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Neuertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious worke it would prone, to besiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this warre, if it were protracted, should bee taken out of his handes; and giuen to one of the Consuls. Cn. Serullius Scipio, that Consul who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such times as hee departed out of Italia: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicil (as it were in chafe of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosn of purpose, to restraine the ambition of this Consul Serullius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Prouince of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire, yet hee needed would be going, procuring onely leaue of the Senate, that he being Consul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authority. But ere He could haue his Fleet and all things in a readines for the iourney, where no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely tost at Sea with foule weather, first vpon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia, where his Consulship expired, and so hee returned home a priuate man. Then came the ioyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now ended. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so pessionae, in desiring Africk for his Prouince, That he said he would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, vnill hee had first his will. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to giue the more plausible answere vnto the Carthaginian Embassadors. Hee willed them to consider what they had deserued; and in regard thereof to thinke themselves well dealt withall, in that he was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subiection; leauing also vnto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, That, before he either granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treatie was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld, then required Hee That immediately they should deliuer vp vnto the Romans all Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they should make no warre at all thence forth out of Africke, neither yet within Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Townes, goods whatsoeuer, belonging any wise vnto the Malaniffas, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should be all by them restored vnto him: That they should finde corne for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, vntill the Peace were fully concluded: That they should pay tenne thousand Talents of Silver, in the terme of fifty yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for obseruance of Conditions, they should giue an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would choofe, being none of them vnder fouretene yeares of age, nor above thirty.

With these conditions the Embassadours returned home, and reported them vnto the Citty. They were very vnpleasing, and therefore one Gisco stood vp to speake against them: and exhorted the people, who gaue good attention, that they should not condescend vnto such intollerable demands. But Hannibal perceiuing this, and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, rose vp and spake vnto them, saying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citty would allow; forasmuch as he had bene thence absent euer since he was a Boy of nine yeares olde, vntill he was now a man of fise and forrie. 20 Having thus excused himselfe of the disorder, hee discoursed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themselves; had the demands of the Enemy bene yet more rigorous. Finally, vpon good aduice, they resolved to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand fise and twenty thousand pounds weight of silver, in recompence of damages, and iniuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gaue iniunction, that they should neither in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismisle any Embassadours to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what 30 their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries wherinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counsailes. Asdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours, who related vnto the Senate and People these ioyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waite a while for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished; and order taken for 40 the Provinces of them, and the new Pretors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadours called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified vnto their King, that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame vnto those Greekes themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately been sent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behinde his fellowes; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betwene him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countreimen, that had lately serued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken prisoners in Africke, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be released and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured so many iniuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to helpe them as he might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiection. As for Sopater: hee affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counsaile, and very inward with him; one that serued not for money, but carried money with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadours could make vnto the Senate no good answer: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre he long, 50 and and warre he should finde, if he proceeded as he had begunne. For in two maine points hee had broken the League, that was betwene him and the Romans: first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had ayded their Enemies against them with men and money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Eastern Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entered into the Senate: and Asdrubal about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessity of sending Embassadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. Hee 10 liberally granted, that the iustice of the quarrell had bene wholly on the Roman side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken: Yet could he not altogether excuse the Citty; that had bene too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanno and himselfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euén at the best of their Fortune, should haue granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had bene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuersitie of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproofe of Pericurius, as they themselves might haue laid vpon the Romans; if their diligence and Fortune had bene such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Asdrubal made answere; Euen by the same gods, that are so seueré vnto those that violate their Leagues.

Lastly, when the Consul interposing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace; for that hereby hee was like to lose the honour, which hee purposed to get by making warre in Africke. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with twenue Delegates sent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with 30 the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embassadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might visite their Countreimen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransom and carrie home with them some, that were their especial friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadours would choofe, should be sent our into Africke, and bee freely restored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commission.

At their comming into Africke, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuersie or disparagement. The Prisoners, Fugitiues and Renegados, were deliuered vnto Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romans than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the first payment of their money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasurie could haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeeres; it was thought meete to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collection of the summe there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begunne to pinch them; so as many, euén of 40 the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not restraîne from laughter. For which when he was checked by Asdrubal Hadum, and tolde, That it worst of all becomed him to laugh, since he had bene the cause why all other did weepe; He answered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but sometime from extremitie of indignation. For hee said He, My laughter is more reasonable, and lesse absurd, than your teares. For ye should haue wept, when ye gaue up your shippes and elephants, and when ye bound your owne hands from the use of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps vs vnder: and holds vs in assured seruitude. But of these matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your priuate purses, ye haue thereof theroof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, That it was the very last part of your miserie, for which ye haueshed these teares. Thus discouraged Hannibal vnto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their owne disorders, which had bred this grievous disease, accused that Physicion, whose noble endeavours had bene employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio being to take leaue of Africk, produced Masanissa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vnderseuedly. To him also hee confessed ouer those Towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: wherein, to say truth, he gaue him but his due; and that which otherwise he knew not well how to bestow. But the loue of the Romans, & friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deseruings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans imbarqued themselves for Sicily: where when they arrived at Lilybæum, Scipio with some part of his Armie tooke his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His iourney through Italy was no lesse glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. Hee entered the Citie in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others intime shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie so in this Triumph, and died soone after in prison: or whether hee were dead a while before, it cannot bee affirmed. Thus much may be auowed, That it was a barbarous cus-tome of the Romans, to insult ouer the calamities of mightie Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courtuous warre. But hereof we shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous warre past, whereof the Romans had bene in a manner without hope that euer they should see Italy free.
This made them looke cheerfully vpon the Author of so great a conuersion; and filled them with more ioy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: filling him by the name of that Prouince which hee had subdued.
This honorable kinde of surname, taken from a conquered Prouince, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Ce-sars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing, as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

Plot, in this version.

F the great similitude found in worldly euents, the limitation of matter hath bene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subject that is not vnbound; the workes of Nature must needs be simi-litate, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependance vpon the will of man, wee are lesse to wonder if wee finde lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious

obnoxious vnto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundrie men are ouer-ruled, in manning the affaires of our daily life. It may be obserued in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the Kingdome of Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and three score thousand Horse: but failing in their intended conquest, they became subject within a while themselves vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with such number of men, as might haue seemed refflesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home againe, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes: who at all times of leisure from intestine Warre, deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made: vnder the great Alexander.
If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old souldiers, had vnderaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, haue bene farre different. Yet would it then haue bene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their owne. For the menacing words vsed by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kinde it may bee, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so auailable to victorie, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the olde Lyon, for the oppressiō done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kicked by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse-vnderstanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noyse, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their owne glorie should be soyled by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereto Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Enilmerodach, had stumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dashed his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better souldier then any other Greekish King, when he entered into warre against the Romans. This war he vnderooke as it were for his minds sake: hauing receiued no iniurie, but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that serued vnder him, to prevail so easily against the barbarous Romans; that they should onely serue as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicily and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their owne vertue to be richer mettall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes: then did all the brauery of the Epirot (his Elephants and whatsoeuer else had serued to make him terrible) serue only to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselves. * For since they had ouercome the best Warriour in Greece, euen him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yere after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those vnwarlike Prouinces, which in compass of 12. yeres a Macedonian King of olde memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion by some good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest this done, would follow of it selfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punicke warre was ended, which followed soone after the warre of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should bee on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skillfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queene Tenua made at the same time cruel Warre vpon the Greekes:
wasting their Country, and lacking their Townes, onely because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queene was not slow to giue them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Putt-ge to bee desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadors, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for loue of Greece they had vnderaken this Illyrian warre. Thus beganne the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which, afterwards increased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose businesse with them, being now the subject of our storie, it is meet that wee should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions. It was like to proue a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. yeeres, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greatest Kingdoms. This hapned from the third yeere of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose room succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemie Philopator succeeded in the Kingdome of Egypt unto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. yeeres old, receiued the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaens; and most of the Greeks by the deccesse of his Vncle Antigonus Deson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedemon, & the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia. Lyceurgus found means to make himselfe King ouer the Lacedemonians, whose Common-weale, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaens, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebelle unto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second & third yeeres of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, loone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaens, and many others his dependants. That Country, hauing freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should haue beene to the Spartans; and therewithal it lay open vnto the violence of the Aetolians, who despised enen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Aetolians were no men to beidle, nor were much addicted to any other Art than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, & (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, then it was vnusit: wherby with greater easie they made spoyle of the Country; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaens, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly; because the Aetolians passing without leave through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Olde Aratus could hardly abide these Aetolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the iniuries, wherewith most ingratelully they had requied no small benefis done to them: by the Achaens. Hee was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay a few daies vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prator of the Achaens for the yeere following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their boorie, through a part of the Countie, wherein he might very easilie haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neere, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie. So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne agayne. As for the Achaens, they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Aetolians inuaded Peloponnesus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countie of the Eleans. There ioynd with them, in this their second inuasion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war vnto the coast of Greece: made bold to seek aduentures agayne, and did great mischief. Demetrius Pharim, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage, which caused him to lose his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell vpon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Aegean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Serdilaidas, or Serdiletus, hauing gotten what they could else-where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Aetolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater hauocke in the Countie now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when hee came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satishe themselves with some speedy reuenge: there were that vtged to haue some grievous punishment layd vpon the Lacedemonians: who were thought vnder hand to haue fauoured the Aetolians, in mere despite of the Achaens and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately bene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedemonians had bene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philip, they flew such friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeale them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to indgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Army: since their Towne was lately much disquieted with ciuil discord, which they hoped soone to appeale, and meant alwayes to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did mis-vnderstand the Lacedemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achaens, Boeotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Aetolians: and desiring to haue warre decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Aetolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Bhim for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue bene there at the day. But when the Aetolians vnderstood this for certaintie, they adourned the Councell vnto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, faue in the great Parliament of all Aetolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how wel they had deserued it, made deccion of Scopas to be their Prator, that was Author of these Inuasions made on Peloponnesus; and the onely man, in a sort, vpon whom they must haue laid the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifed it from the publicke.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where hee prepared busily for the warre against the yeere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Serdilaidas, with faire words and promises; whom he easily won from the Aetolian side, forasmuch as the Aetolians had coufessed him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaens, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countie; sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, & Lacedemonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce warre vnto the Aetolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they receiued diuerse answers, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Aetolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; sayd, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithfull meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood vpon a needlesse point, and desired to be held excused, vntill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messenians, for whose cause the warre was vnderaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Aetolians held vpon their borders; and sayd, that they durst not be ouer-bold, vntill that bidle were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedemonians, the chiefe of them shewed onely, how to mannage the treason, for which their City had bene so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three yeeres together continued subiect against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should returne out of Egypt to reigne ouer them agayne, and maintayne, as hee was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publicke safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preserued them: And hereto they referred all their countailes: being perhappes a little moued with respect of the benefis, which might redound

vnto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and those the greater part, were still deuising, how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his returne; and sought to ioine with the Ætolians, which were the most likely to giue him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority and durst more freely speake their mindes: but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders, or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neyther did it suffice, that about these times there came certayne report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying vnto themselves the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come agayne. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto their greatnesse and lustre; which once hee had in a manner performed: But since hee was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deseruing vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helpe, they must continue little better than subiects vnto the Macedonians, and farre lesse by him respected, than were the Achaens. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Ætolians to send an Embassage to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durst haue made himselfe the Author. Much disputation, and hot there was, betwene those of the Macedonian partie, and these their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; vnill by massacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Ætolians, the diuersitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betwene the Lacedemonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achaens, who had spared the Citie, when they might haue destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, astouching the choosling of the one King, that wee may iustly wonder, how they grew so careless in making choice of the other. In the one of their royall Families they found Agepsolis, the son of Agepsolis the son of king Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne ouer them, as heire apparant to his grandfather. This Agepsolis was a yong Boy, standing in neede of a Guardian; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Governement. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how young soeuer, should haue his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedemonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in obseruation of the Law, that they made this childe their King, and appoynted his Vncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the royall Family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime: but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the kingdom, bestowed vpon each of the Ephors, a Talent, and thereby made himselfe be filiated King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to graue his Parusins, and to appoue his worth by action, invaded the Countrey of the Argives: which lay open and vngarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great spoile, and won diuers Townes; whereof two he retained, and annexed vnto the State of the Lacedemonians. After such open hostility, the Lacedemonians declared themselves on the Ætolian side; and proclaimed warre against the Achaens.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, then the Achaens and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gaue vncertayne answer: the Messenians would not stirre: all the burden must lie vpon themselves and the poore Acaronians, whom the Ætolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and by helpe of the Lacedemonians, could assaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing ouer the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Towne of Ægira: which if they could haue held, they should thereby grieuously haue molested the Achaens, for that it stood in the mid-way betwene Ægium and Sicyon, two of their principall Citities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But as Ægira was taken by surprize: so was it presently left agayne, through greedinesse of spoyle, whilst they that should haue made it their first care, to assure the place vnto themselves, by occupying the citadel and other peeces of strength, fell heedlesly to ranke private houses, and thereby gaue the the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great slaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Westerne Coast of Achaia; waiting all the Territories of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achaean Confederacie. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so well beaten, that the enimie grew bolder with them than before. They sent for helpe vnto their Prætor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achaens hauing lately beene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doe little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his warre, they had contumeliously withheld part of their due from those that serued them therein. So through this disability of the Achaens, and insufficiency of their Prætor, the Dymeans, with others, were driuen to withhold their contribution heretofore made for the publike seruice, and to conuert the money to their owne defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedemonians, began to winne vpon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Achaens. Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Armie was thus employed a while off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him: and by such their fine readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier peece, which they desired to get into their owne hands: for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There hee spent fortie dayes, ere he could end the busines; which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had hee entered into the heart of Ætolia at his first comming in, it was thought that he might haue had an end of the war. But in happens off, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not seldom, that the importunitie of Associates, to haue their owne desires fulfilled; couerts the preparatiōs of great Kings to those vses for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindring the prosecution of their maine designs. Thus was our King Henrie the eighth aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the siege of Tourmay: at such time as the French King Lewes the twelfth, hearing that the strong Citie of Terruin was lost, and that his Cavallerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, was shoulde be beaten by the Earle of Essex with seuen hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would haue come to Paris.

The day that Philip made at Ambracia, did wondrously embolden the Ætolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopas aduentured to leade all their forces out of the Countrey; and therewith not onely to ouer-runne Thessalie, but to make impresseion into Macedoni. He came as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Ægean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his comming, he tooke, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the rest, he threw downe the Statuas that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrey men at his returne; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to bee growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euen to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrey, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip hauing dispatched his worke at Ambracia, made a strong inuasion vpon Ætolia. He tooke Phœtie, Metropolis, Oeniade, Panionum, Elaus, and diuers other Townes and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundrie skirmishes; and wasted all the Countrie ouer, without receiuing any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrey of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Achaean Embassadors: newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardani were ready with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrie. These Dardaniens were barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hemus from the Northerne part of Macedon, and were accustomed to seeke booty in that wealthy Kingdome, when they found their own times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journey into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey; as had bene their manner vpon the like advantages. This made the King to dismisst the Achaean Embassadors, (whom he should haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeere. So hee tooke his way homewards: and as hee was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired vnto him Demetrius Pharius, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Dofon, in the warres of Cleomenes; and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whose Counsaillor he was euer after. The Dardaniens hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie, and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilst his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Aetolians rested not. They augmented themselves vpon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Asolia, they required, with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre vnill another yeere was laid aside: Philip stole a iourne into Peloponnesus, with fise thousand Foot, and about foure hundred Horfe. As soone as he was within Corinth, he commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might be carried forth of his arrival. Hee sent priuily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him: with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would haue the Achaens Souldiors readie to meete him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horfe; little thinking to meet with such opposition. Indeede they had little cause to feare: since the Achaens themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; vnill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Aetolians, and their fellows, were by him surpris'd, and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which he did at his first coming, Philip got very much reputation and likewise he purchased both reputation and loue, by diuers actions immediately following. He won Phosphis, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Aetolians then held. Hee wonne it by assault at his first coming: wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemye, not beleeuing that he would vndertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeere, was carelesse of providing euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was preferred by the King from lacke, and giuen to the Achaens, of his owne meere motion, before they requed it. Thence went he to Lysion, which yielded for very feare; hearing how easilie he had taken Phosphis. This Towne also he gaue to the Achaens. The like liberality he vsed towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recouered. Then fell hee vpon the Countrie of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three daies; Hee proceeded on to the spoyle of those, that had taken pleasure to shire with the Aetolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise despoiling neighbours. Great abundance of Cattle hee tooke, with great numbers of slaues, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell hee in hand with the Townes whereinto a great multitude of the Countrie-people were fledde. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yielded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his iourney, by sending Embassadors to yeeld before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wills, tooke courage to set themselves at libertie, by seeing the King so neere; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Aetolian Captaines, because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King wonne more Townes in the Countrie, than the sharpnesse of Winter would suffer him to stay there dayes. Faine he would haue fought with the Aetolians; but they made such haste from him, that he could not ouertake them, till they had couered themselves within the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to haue beene safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their liues and armes. Hauing performed so much in this expedition, the King reposed himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then remooued to Argos, where hee spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arrival in Peloponnesus, the Lacedaemonians with Lycargus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; and threatened to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging

ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lycargus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which hee could buy with money: so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him, nor from those ieaousies, with which vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that thinking himselfe to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Common wealth. Hee woane to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycargus his house: who perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should giue account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto predisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilst hee was vsing his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceiued whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So he liued afterwards among the Achaens a banished man, and hated of his owne people. As for Lycargus, hee returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found means to driue out his fellow-King yong Agapostolus; where by hee made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to bee suspected, in such sort as once he should haue beene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might haue beene defended; yet rather than to adventure himselfe into iudgement, he chose to flie for a time, and so iourne among his friends the Aetolians. His well knowne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknesse of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, hee tooke better heed vnto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they list'd. By what actions hee got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that he chased Agapostolus out of the Citie; I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three very iustly deserved. Whatsoeuer he was toward some priuate Citizens: in the warre against Philip, he behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countreys good.

S. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsaillors: who afterwards wrought treason against him; and were iustly punished. Hee inuadeth the Aetolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted vnto them.

Whilst the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the yeare following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their owne generall goodnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that hee tooke in hand. Antigonus Dofon had left vnto Philip such Counsaillors, as to him did seeme the fittest men for governing of his youth. The chiefe of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that hee should doe a notable peece of seruice to his Prince; if hee could reduce the Achaens vnto the same degree of subiection, wherein the Macedonians liued. To bring this to passe, during the late Expedition hee had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achaens out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, hee was bold to chastise some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whipper them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to helpe their fellows, then hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should bee qualified with an habite of blind obediences; and thinke nothing vnjust that pleased the King. But these Achaens were tenderly sensible in matters of libertie: whereof if they could haue beene contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the warre against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves vnto olde Aratus, and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty, than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbade Apelles to follow the course begonne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choller for a time. He thought so well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside, being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the filth had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Acheans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promising to become their especial friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe; letting him know, that as long as hee continued to make much of Aratus, he must beaine to deale precisely with the Acheans; and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Acheans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conforme themselves vnto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such persuasions, he drew the King to be present at Egium, where the Acheans were to hold election of a new Prator. There with much more labour, than would haue bin needfull in a businesse of more importance; the King by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new favourites, was chosen Prator, instead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yeelded it vp forsaere, at his first coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymeans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, hee had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vnderooke to make them forke their alliance with the Atolians, and ioyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to doe, he willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand, That hee would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrein inuasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrey: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before our-habit to beleue such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breede a mutuall diffidence betweene them and the Atolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him prisoner into Atolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe, in better for Aratus. For the King (as was sayd) maruailling what should be the cause, that he heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which hee had made vnto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsaillor, thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus. He sayd that old Aratus, and his some together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he sayd it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out: For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be very preiudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very careful in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lie, deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already convicted. And when hee had said all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of these Acheans; and therein hauing made it knowne what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leaue you to your felices. Old Aratus grauely admonished the King; That whensoever hee heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth, He should forbear a while to giue credit, vntill he had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard this talke with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himselfe the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yes, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles delayed to bring in the prooff, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and tolde what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracy of the Arati: which when he found no better than a meere device against his honourable friends; He entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remissi in therein could be discerned.

The vnrestfull temper of Apelles, hauing with much vehemence brought nothing to passe; began (as commonly Ambition vsith) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, he had prepared a snare for the Arati, so flying of them, he thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimnie; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to bee caught and held by the subtil wokenmanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithfull men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the Targueters, and Megalas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily wonne to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remouee the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their rooms. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumination and pricke detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he vsed more finenesse, loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwaies in his presence. By such Art hee thought to haue remoued him as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sunne. In the meane season Aratus retired himselfe; and sought to auoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prator of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; Hee was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was lost, whilest Philip wanted both the money and the Corne; wherewith hee should haue bene furnished by the Acheans. This made the King vnderstand his owne errour, which he wisely sought to reforme betimes. Hee perswaded the Acheans to reiourne their Parliament from Egium, to Sycion the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his sonne: perswading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth hee intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, He easily obtained what he would of the Acheans. Fifty talents they gaue him out of hand; with great store of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as hee himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, hee should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to prouide shipping, that so he might inuade the Atolians, Eleans, and Lacedemonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; and by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entered into conspiacie with Leontius and Megalas: binding himselfe and them by Oath, to crosse and bring bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of ability to doe any thing without them; should make him speake them faire; and bee glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a child, and therefore these wise men perswaded themselves, that, by looking bigge vpon him, and imputing vnto him all that fell out ill through their own misgouernment of his affaires, they might rule him as a child still. Apelles would needes goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behinde with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His fleet and Armie being in a readinesse: Philip made countenance, as if hee would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Aetolians sent men, little fearing that the mischiefe would haue fallen as soone after it did, vpon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to helpe them, Philip thought it enought to leaue the Achaens, with some part of his and their Mercenaries. Hee himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephallenia: whence the Aetolians dwelling ouer against it, vsed to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There he besieged the Towne of Palea, that had bene very seruicable to the Enemie against him and his Confederates; and might be very vsefull to him, if hee could get it. Whilst he lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fiftene shippes of warre from Sceerulaidis; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts save one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith hee ouerthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontius Capitaine of the Targetiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembering his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to doe his best; and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foyle, and many slaine, not of the worst souldiers, but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would haue carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Capitaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedie; and therefore so he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was easier vnto the Townes men to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst he stood thus perplexed and vncertaine what couer to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrey. The Messenians altogether, that Lycurgus was busie in wasting their Countrey: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Etesian windes which then blew, serving fitly for his Navigation. Heereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dogge-dayes) and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gaue better counsaile, and prevailed. He shewed how vsiting it were, to let the Aetolians ouer-runne all Thessalie againe, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small adventures. Rather, hee said, that the time now serued well to carrie the warre into Aetolia; since the Prætor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycurgus; he was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus; and it might suffice, if the Achaens were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King sets sayle for Aetolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which diuided the Aetolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and ioyned with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. He marched vp into the in-land Countrey; and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retreat; He passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Aetolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Countrey round about was a great Fastnesse, enuironed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Aetolians vse to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne games. There also they vsed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them careless in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoile: whereof whereof he found such plentie, that he thought the paines of his journey well recompenced. So he loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chiefe of all belonging vnto the Aetolians; in remembrance of their like courtisie, shewed vpon the Temples of Diem and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue bene forbome. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Capitaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Aetolians laid for him: which that they would doe, he beleued before; and therefore was not taken vnawares: Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts: but hee had laid a Counter-ambush for them of his Thyrians; who staying behinde the rest, did set vpon the backs of the Aetolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with slaughter of the enemie, hee returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Countrey round about him, hee safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Aetolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The ioy of this victorious Expedition being euery way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast vnto all his friends and Capitaines. Thither were invited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megalas. They came, because they could not chooseth: but their heauy looks argued what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperity. It grieved them to thinke, that they should be able to giue no better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had plaied his owne part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to railing him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King lending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellows. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megalas, and another with him, came. The King began to ratchet for their disorder; and they, to giue him froward answers: in so much as they said at length, That they would neuer giue ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as hee deserved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targetiers at his heels: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megalas, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, it was euery I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angrie; seeing himselfe out-frowned; and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after Megalas was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victorie at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no lesse touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megalas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak; that he, and Crinon one of his fellows, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crinon being remanded backe to prison; and Leontius becoming Bayle for Megalas. This was done vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as hee was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedamonians. These and the Eleans had done what harme they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Achaens had opposed them as well as they could; with ill successe, yet so, as they hindered them from doing such harme as else they would haue done. But when Philip came, he ouer-ran the Countrey about Lacedamon: and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleue that he was returned out of Aetolia. He tooke not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fieldes: and hauing beaten the enemie in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cartell, slaues, and other Countrey-spoile. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians: that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Aetolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deale first with the Aetolians; who, if they would make the same request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Asolians had sped ill that yeare: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeares following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had bene grievously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weak Allies the Elans and Lacedemonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Asolians readily entertained this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty daies with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his presence at a Diet of their nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them comfortable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand, Leontius and Megalas thought to haue terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device sort to no good effect. The souldiers were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noise, and breaking open of doores, without further harme done. This was enough to informe the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the souldiers themselves, repenting of their insolence, desired to haue the Authors of the tumult fought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if hee had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megalas were affraide, lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repaire vnto Corinth, where hee might stand betwene them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while bene wanting to the businesse, vndertaken by him and his treacherous companions. Hee had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was growne up into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessaly addressed themselves vnto him, and receiued from him their dispatch in euery businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making slight mention (onely for fashions sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himselfe out vnto the people: but in managing the Kings affaires, hee made it his speciall care, that money, and all things needfull for the publique seruice, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the King, for very neede, to sell his owne Plate and household vessels: thinking to resolue these and all other difficulties, by onely saying, Sir, he ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Heceto if the King would giue assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Isle of Euboea, to the city of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers, which Leontius and Megalas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entering the city with a goodly traine, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his fallshood. Wherefore one was sent to tel him, that he should wait a while, or come another time; for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace, in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of priuacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megalas to look to himselfe, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targetters, as it were to do some piece of seruice, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targetters, to signify what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, hee might not be called called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megalas, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiers made Philip more hastie than else he would haue bene, to take away the Traiters life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megalas were intercepted, which hee wrote vnto the Asolians; vilifying the King with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was euen ready to shake vnder the burden of his owne penurie. By this the King vnderstood more perfectly the fallshood, not onely of Megalas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megalas, who was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their liues. Megalas also, neither daring to stand to triall, nor knowing whither to flie, was weary of his owne life; and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Asolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Arctus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Neuertheless being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold vpon all aduantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megalas, together with some indignation thereupon conceiued by some of the Kings Targetters; they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing forie. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this vnquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning & continuing the warre should rest vpon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified hee his Macedonian souldiours, by yielding to let them winter in their owne Countrey. In this returne homeward, he called into iudgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Townes; from which the Dardaniens, Asolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdom: when hee had thus provided for safety of his owne; the Asolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Aegypt, and from the Citie of Egyptum, recontinuing the former solicitation about the Peace. This fashion had been taken vp in matters of Greece, euer since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to set the whole Countrey at libertie: No sooner was any Province or Citie in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of warre, but presently there were found intercessors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad sought to binde vnto them those people, that were howsoever weak in numbers, yet very good souldiours. But hereby it came to passe, that the more forward sort, especially the Asolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falsehood and robbrie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their Neighbours: being well assured, that if they had the worst; The loue of Greece would be sufficient for to redeeme their quiet. They had, since the late Treacie of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing in feare to bee more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly then before, to make an end of the Warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer vnto the Embassadors, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not oncession to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Asolians, if they had a desire to liue in rest, must first bee dealt withall, to signify plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answer as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the middle of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victory Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battaile at Thrasymene. These letters hee communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian Warre. Heereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Aetolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Napactus. There did Agelaus an Aetolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing Warre betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all meanes to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrey should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of warre, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly seruing, to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie.

Such aduice could the Aetolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatening them at hand: but being soone after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from observing and following their own good counsell, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countrey, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrey) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betweene Hannibal and Philip.

I His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canna: after which he ioyned in league with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise beene farre more expedient for Philip to haue supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equall termes; and so thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsaile which hee followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Aetolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon such Conditions that might easily be broken: haue beene related in another place, as belonging vnto the second Punicke Warre. Wherefore I will onely heere serdowne the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthy to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed; though it had beene ouer-long to haue beene inserted into a more busie peece.

The Oath and Couenants betweene Hannibal, Generall of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embassador of Philip King of Macedon.

I HIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Armie, haue made with Xenophanes the sonne of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the sonne of Demetrius hath sent vnto us, for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Iupiter, and Iuno, and Apollo: before The God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolaus, before Mars, Tri-ton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Earth; before Riuers and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods, that haue power ouer Carthage; before all the Gods that rule ouer Macedon, and the rest of Greece, before all the Gods that are Presidents of Warre, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Armie: Be it agreed betweene Ton and Vs, that this Oath stand for friendship and louing affection, that We become friends, familiar, and brethren, vpon Countenants, that the safety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians vsing the same Lawes, and of the Vitians; & as many Cities & Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Associates, and of all Townes and Nations with which We hold friendship in Italy, Gaulle, and Liguria, and with whom we shall hold friendship or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be procured by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greekes as are their Associates. In like manner shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Associates, be laued and preserved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Vitians, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaulle and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter ioyne with Vs in Italy. Wee shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. With all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtiltie, We shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Towns, and Hauens, with which we haue already league and friendship. Wee also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we haue already league and friendship. The warre that we haue with the Romans, haue we also with them, until the Gods shall giue vs a new and happie end. We shall aid Vs with those things wherof we haue need, and shall doe according to the Couenants betweene Vs. But if the Gods shall not giue vs to Ton and Vs their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, Wee shall make friendship in such wise that we shall be partakers of the same friendship, with Condition, That they shall not haue power to make warre vpon you: Neither shall the Romans be Lords ouer the Corycraans, nor ouer those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render vnto Demetrius Pharius all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romanes Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make warre vpon Te or Vs; Wee will succour one another in that warre, as either shall haue need. The same shall be observed in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom wee hold already league and friendship. To this league if we or Te shall thinke fit to adde or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

How Philip yielded to his naturall vices being therein foorth by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannise vpon the free States his Associates. With the troubles, into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punick warre. He possoneth Aratus: and growes hateful to the Achæans.

Hitherto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, hee might haue offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand: yet this meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatness of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrey. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath bene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly gouerned him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudy, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not other wise listning to doe what he ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee rooke in hand. Before hee should busie himselfe in Italie, hee thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Hereunto Apelles had aduised him before: and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boyssour Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if he might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunity at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obscure the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reins in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betwene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forein warre) vnto domestical obiects, than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In processe of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: refusing so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strue any more about their Gouernment: for that hee would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his comming thither, hee found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore hee consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in priuate with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the vnruelie Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere that hee were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouernours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the people tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemed, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear, to tell him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But hauing already done more then was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should neede the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as hee could. He ledde olde Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There hee pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice hee did. But it was his purpose to keepe the peace to his owne vie; for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Countrey. Whilst hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entralls of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner, Hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue foorthed him a litle; were it onely for desire to make amends, for the angry words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou be a Souldieryer, thou maist goe thy wayes, and let slip this good advantage; If thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus he spake, redembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two hornes of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well doneto keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, He must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his souldiers, and keepe men in duetie, as he had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing betwene Him and the Arats; whom he thought more froward than becomed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affairs, or be inward with him. For as he plainly discouered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise hee perceived, that in resorting to his house, He had bene dishonest with his sonnes wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his owne Countreiman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That vnholiest counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But Hee would needs haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his Will, He seized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what hee listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in steed of settling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench, vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whilst hee was thus labouring to binde the hands that should haue fought for him in Italie: M. Valerius the Romane came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee haue related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In manning whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure serued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another journey into their Countrey, with hope to deceive them, as before. They vnderstood him better now than before; and therefore were not hasty to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, He went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, intruded them with open Vwarre. But in that warre he could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messene hee lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsaillor and Flatterer, not his peruerter, as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that hee spied, the more angry hee waxed against those that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the ministry of Taurion, his Lieutenant, hee possonned olde Aratus; and shortly after that hee possonned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue bene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the possyons themselves were more fire than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, dected vnto

Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to be celebrated euery yeere twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose; as was accustomed vnto the Hermes, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to haue bene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollon: which is like enough to haue bene true; since the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achaens a marvellous dislike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take countsaile for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or beleued: neither were they in cale to susbit, without his helpe that had committed it. The Achaens were a most outrageous people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans made a league: whereof the Conditions were soone divulged, especially that maine point, concerning the diuision of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Atolians should haue the country and Townes; but the Romans the spoyle, and carry away the people to sell for slaves. The Achaens, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make freight alliance with the Atolians, as knowing their vnicill disposition; were much the more auerle from them, when they perceiued how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauocke of the Country. The same consideration moued also the Lacedaemonians, to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Atolians, whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Achaens his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially at such time, as their owne necessitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himselfe the Dymeans, by an inestimable benefit: recouering their Towne, after it had bene taken by the Romans and Atolians; and redeeming their people whereof they might be found, that had been carried away Captiue, and sold abroad for slaves. Thus might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences past; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and giuen mento vnderstand, that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof hee was not ashamed; He tooke Polyxara the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serue to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time: for of that which hapned in this their first Inuasion, I holde it superfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen General of the Achaens: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedamon. Battaille betwene them, wherein Mechanidas is slaine.

It happens often, that the disease of one eminent man discouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood vp Philopœmen: whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achaens redoubtable among all the Greekes, and careless of such protection, as in former times they had neede against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a young man, and hauing no command; did especiall seruice to Antigonus at the battaille of Selassia against Cleomenes. Thence forward vntill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldom or neuer at peace betwene themselves; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, hee had charge of the Horie: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, trauiailing with all the Cities of the Confederacie to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also hee so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of seruice that hee made the Achaens very strong in that part of their forces. Being afterward chosen Prætor or General of the Nation, hee had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Achaens to cut off their vaine expense of brauerie, in apparell, household stuffe, and curious fare, and to bellow that cost vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiers, and futeable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had serued hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast attaint off; that were vsfull in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprises, or suddaine and hastic Expeditions; whereto Aratus had bene most accustomed. But when they came to handle strokes, they were good for nothing: so long as they were wholly driuen to relie vpon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: causing them to arme themselves more weightily, to vse a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for seruite at hand. He taught them also to fight in close orders; and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files so deepe as had bene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the seruice of many hands.

Eight Moneths were spent of that yeere, in which he first was Prætor of the Achaens; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedamon caused him to make tryall, how his Souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the successor vnto Lycargus; a man more violent than his forgoer. He kept in pay a strong Armie of Mercenaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta; but to heke the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Achaens, that were fauourers of liberty; but to strengthen himselfe by friendship with the Atolians: who, in making Alliances, took no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedamon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argines, Achaens, and Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Atolian Faction. Very vnwisely. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindred themselves thereby from recouering the Maistrie of their owne Citie. This affeccion of the Spartans, together with the regard of his owne securitie, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but alwaies made him redie to fall vpon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what hee could, whilst they were enforced, by greater necessitie, to turne face another way. Thus had he often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose suddencoming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him faile of his attempts. At the present He was stronger in men, than were the Achaens; and thought his owne men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whilst Philip therefore was busied else-where, he entred the Countrey of the Mantians: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the Lordship of Peloponnesus, as hauing stronger friendes, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertaine him at Mantinea; where was fought betwene them a great battaille. The Tyrant had brought into the field vpon Cartes a great many of Engines, where with to beat vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen sent forth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continuall supply, till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achaens and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being so farre aduanced, each before their owne Phalanx; that it could no otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vnseruiceable, by the interposition of his owne men; in such manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant preuailed at length: not only by their aduantage of number, but (as Polybius well obserueth) by summounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein vsually the hired souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which lie oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, haue hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to assure their owne seruitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruites of his prosperitie, haue good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their owne; whereas they that serue vnder a free State, haue no other motive to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the victorie: many Companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellowes will not take much paines to bring the war to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more subiects; and therefore stands in feare of more, that should seek to take reuenge vpon him. The stipendiaries therefore of the Achaens, being forced to giue ground, were vrged so violently in their retrayt by those of Machanidas, that shortly they betooke themselves to flight; and could not be staied by any persuasions of Philopemen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Achaens. This disaster had bene sufficient to take from Philopemen the honour of the day; had he not wisely obserued the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that error which might restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gaue chase vnto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedemonians; whom he thought sufficient to deale with the Achaens, that were already disheartened by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of sight; Philopemen advanced towards the Lacedemonians that stood before him. There lay betwene them a thirtie the Countrie a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedemonians aduanced ouer it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Achaens; who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaile; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further bank, than they were stoutly charged by the Achaens, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first 20 ranks being broken, all the rest beganne to shrink: so as Philopemen getting ouer the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopemen knew better how to vie his advantage, than Machanidas had done. Hee suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chase: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chase, looked very heauily when hee saw what was fallen out. Yet with a lustie Troupe of Horse about him Hee made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Achaens in disorder; and to set vpon their backs, as they were carelesly pursuing their victorie. But when hee and his companie saw Philopemen ready to make good the bridge against them; then beganne euerie one to looke, 30 which way hee might shift for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassocke, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopemen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge to another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as hee was getting ouer it, slew him there with his owne hand. There dyed in this Battaile of the Lacedemonians side about foure thousand: and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achaen Mercenaries, probable it is that the losse was not greatly cared for; since that Warre was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should haue need. 40

§. VI.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia; and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victorie the Achaens learned to thinke well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of war inferior to any, that should haue brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonians, He made 50 no great vie of them: but when hee had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians; Hee studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. Hee tooke in hand many matters together, or very neerely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achaens would haue done him seruice; they must, by helping him to oppress others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with themselves. Hee greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had ioyned with the Romans and Ætolians in war against him.

This

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble-man, otherwise than as hee was enabled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Philetarus his Vncle: who being gilded, by reason of a mishap which he had when hee was a childe, grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great men in those times repoted much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not be obliged vnto wiues or children. He was entertained into the familie of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, hee accompanied his Master, that betooke himselfe to Lyfimachus King of Thrace. Lyfimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accompts. But when at length he stood in feare of this King, that grew a bloudie Tyrant: He fled into Asia, where he seized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lyfimachus. The Towne and monie, together with his owne seruice, Hee offered vnto Seleucus the first, that then was ready to giue Lyfimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleucus having slaine Lyfimachus, dyed shortly after himselfe, before hee made vnto Philetarus or his monie. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Countrie round about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is said to haue bene a poore Carter; and the yonger perhaps not much better; before such time they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetarus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his aduantage of the dissention, betwene Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the sonnes of the second Antiochus. He fought a battell with Hierax, nere vnto Sardes and won the victory. At which time, to animate his men against the Gauls that serued vnder his Enemy, hee vied a pretty deuice. He wrote the word "Victorie" vpon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off: and when the hore liuer of the beast that was sacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainly fore- 11. shewing that the gods would be assistant in that Battaile.

30 After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Seleucus: who neuer durst attempt to recouer from him, by Warre, the Territorie that he had gotten and held. Finally, when hee had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a surfer of ouer-much drinke, and left his Kingdome to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the yongest brother of Philetarus. Attalus was an vndertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence hee had bene expelled. He was grieuously molested by Achaen: who sitting vp himselfe as King against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his owne City of Pergamus: but by the help of the Techagæ, a Nation of the Gauls, whom hee called ouer out of Thrace, Hee recouered all that hee had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they neuer wanted 40 employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themselves, without inuitation, and found themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his warre against Byzantium. Whereunto when hee had condescended; they neuertheless within a while after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vied it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing; they occupied the Region about Hellepont: where, in fearing themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuertheless, presuming afterwards vpon their strength; they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had 50 worse deferred of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill vp the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posterity of such, as had saued themselves and their Prouinces, in the slothfull reigne of the Persians; or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atissa, sister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdices, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdices Perdiccas crucified, eſpying his time while the Macedonians were at ciuill warres among themſelues; recovered his dominion, and paſſed it ouer to his off-ſpring. The Kings of Pontus had alſo their beginning from the Perſian Empire, and are ſaid to haue iſſued from the royall houſe of Achamenes. The Paphlagonians deriued themſelues from Pylmenes, a King that aſſiſted Priamus at the warre of Troy. Theſe, applying themſelues vnto the times, were alwayes conformable vnto the ſtrongeſt. The Anceſſors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bithynia, ſome few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay ſomewhat out of the Macedonian way: by whom therefore, hauing other employment, they were the leſſe moleſted. Calanus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrey, where hee was vanquiſhed. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them ſomewhat more humble. And thus they thruſt, as did the reſt, vntill the reigne of Prusias, whom we haue already ſometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Towne of Cior taken by Philip, at the inſtance of Prusias King of Bithynia, and cruelly deſtroyed. By this and like actions, Philip growes hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred vpon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

Ruſas a ſeighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whoſe greamer he ſuſpected. He therefore ſtrengthened himſelfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrarie ſide, entred into a ſtrict Confederacie with the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Æolian warre, and was deuiſing with Antiochus about ſharing betweene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolemy Philopater aſcended vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his ſonne Ptol. Euphemes a young childe his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and beſtow it vpon him. Prusias had no right vnto the Towne, nor iuſt matter of quarrell againſt it: but it was ſely ſeared for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came; as ſo one that could not well denieto helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no ſmall part of Greece. Embaſſadours came to him whileſt he lay at the ſiege, from the Rhodians, and diuers other States: entreating him to forſake the Enterpriſe. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwiſe gentle answers: making ſhew as if he would condeſcend to their requeſt, when he intended nothing leſſe. At length he got the Towne: where, euin preſence of the Embaſſadours, of whoſe ſolicitation hee had ſeemed ſo regardfull, He omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby hee rendred himſelfe odious to his neighbours, as a perſidious and cruell Prince. Eſpecially his fact was deteſted of the Rhodians, who had made vehement interceſſion for the poore Ciani: and were aduerted by Embaſſadours of purpoſe ſent vnto them from Philip, That, howſoeuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as ſoone as he liſted: yet in regard of his loue to the Rhodians, Hee was contented to giue it ouer. And by this his clemencie, the Embaſſadours ſaid, that he would manifeſt vnto the world, what ſlanderous tongues they were; which noyſed abroad ſuch reports, as went of his falſhood and oppreſſion. Whileſt the Embaſſadours were declaiming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came ſome that made a true relation of what had hapned: ſhewing that Philip had ſacked and deſtroyed the Towne of Cui, and, after a cruell ſlaughter of the Inhabitants, had made ſlaues of all that eſcaped the ſword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great deſpite, no leſſe were the Ætolians inflamed againſt him: ſince they had ſent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before ſo by his doings at Lyſimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacie to his owne) what little truſt was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But moſt of all others was Attalus moued with conſideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his owne eſtate. He had much to loſe; and was not without hope of getting much if he could make a ſtrong Partie in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexander: Captaines, in purchaſing with much liberalitie the loue of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, hauing loſt their owne. On the friendſhip of the Ætolians hee had cauſe to preſume; hauing bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Ægyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, he eaſily drew into a ſtreight alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceiued againſt Philip.

Vpon confidence in theſe his friends, but moſt of all, in the ready aſſiſtance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had bene vniſonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemy tended; ſince his deſire to ſaſten vpon Asia was manifeſt, and his falſhood no leſſe manifeſt, than was ſuch his deſire. They met with him ſhortly not farre from Chios, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driuen to runne his owne ſhippe on ground, hardly eſcaping to land: though the Admirall of the Rhodians tooke his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie, by which they had fought, ſo that he had the gathering of the wracks vpon the ſhoare: Yet forſmuch as he had ſuſſered far greater loſſe of ſhips and men, than had the Enemy; and ſince he durſt not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adiuſged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards beſieged and wonne ſome Townes in Caria: whether only in a brauery, and to deſpight his oppoſites; or whether vpon any hopefull deſire of conqueſt, it is vncertain. The ſtraggling, by which hee wonne Prinassus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a Myne: and finding the Earth ſo ſtony, that it reſiſted his worke; he neuertheleſſe commanded the Pioners to make a noiſe vnder ground; and ſecretly in the night-time he raiſed great Mounds about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the beſieged, that the worke went maruellouſly forward. At length he ſent word to the Towneſ-men, that by his vnder-mining, two acres of their wall ſtood only vpon wooden proppes, to which if hee gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they ſhould expect no mercy. The Prinassians little thought, that hee had ſerched all his earth and rubbiſh by night a great way off, to raiſe vp thoſe heapes which they ſaw; but rather that all had bene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they ſuſtained themſelues to be out-faced, and gaue vp the Towne as loſt, which the Enemy had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not ſtay to ſettle himſelfe in thoſe parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too ſtrong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haſte backe into Macedon, whither they followed him all the way in manner of purſuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, ſeek matter of quarrell againſt Philip. The Athenians vpon ſight cauſe, proclaime warre againſt Philip; moued thereto by Attalus; whom they ſuſtainer. Philip winnes diuers Townes: and makes peremptorie answers to the Roman Ambaſſadour. The furious reſolution of the Abydeni.

Here Aſiaticque matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet ſerued well to make a noiſe in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a deſire of making warre in Macedon, at leaſt with a conceit that it were expedient ſo to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the ſtate of thoſe Eaſterne Countreies; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greekes, which lay betweene them and the Lordſhip of Asia. Theſe Greekes were ſaſcious, and ſeldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece euin ſince the reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturalls: yet moſt of them abhorred his Dominion, becauſe he was originally footſooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had bene moſt beholding vnto him, were neuertheleſſe weary of him, by reaſon of his perſonall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detain the Roman Amies: eſpecially ſince the diuiſions of the Countrey were ſuch, that euery petty Eſtate was apt to take counſaile apart for it ſelfe; without much regarding the generality. But the poore Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to ſuch a chargeable enterpriſe. They were already quite exhausted, by that grieuous war with Hannibal: wherein they had giuen by Loane to the Republicke, all their money: neither had they as yet receiued, neither did they receiue vntill fifteene or fixteene yeares after this, their whole ſumme backe againe. That part of payment alſo which was already made, being not in preſent mony, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to reſt a while, and beſtow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they tooke no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that solicited not only the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Islands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadors, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong either of himselfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Aetolians their good friends, (and in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affaires of those, that were more mightie than himselfe. He was too vnskillfull, or rather wise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would hee needes be seeking new enemies. And hee found them such, as hee deferred to haue them: for he offered his helpe to their distraction, when they were in miserie, and had done him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to haue strained his forces to the utmost in making warre vpon them; or in desisting from that iniurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs so past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But hee, hauing broken that League of peace which is of all other the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnlesse they thinke themselves iustly prouoked, was afterwards too fondly persuaded, that hee might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Covenants of peace between him and them. There is not any forme of oath, where by such attitudes of peace can be held inviolable, save onely * by the water of Syx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it bindes one partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparent, that he shall be a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) be presumed, that there shall bee no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans neuer hearkened after Philip: for necessitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was the River of Syx dried vp: and then could they swear as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne selues, euen by their good swords, that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sepater into Africke, and the present warre against Attalus, were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, tooke state vpon them neuertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarmania entering into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainly bid to becauailable vnto felicity after this life) discovered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by mere error, not thinking to haue therein done amisse; yet, as it had beene for some bairns time, they were put to death. All their Countrymen at home tooke this in ill part; and sought to reuenge it as a publike iniurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to helpe them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; and carried thence a great bootie. This indignitie stirred vp the high-minded Athenians; and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had ability to performe. All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadors to King Attalus, gratulating his happy successe against Philip, and entreating him to visit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing, because hee vnderstood that the Roman Embassadors, hauing about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to bee there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his owne followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they reioicing that he continued enemy to Philip; and hee being no lesse glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the warre. The Athenians came out of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wiues and children, in as lofty pompe as they could deuise, to meeete and honour the King. They entertained the the Romans that were with him, in very louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of obsequance, which their flatterie could suggest. At his first coming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe, saying, That with an euill grace hee should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which hee studied to make them know what loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that hee should deliuer in writing, what hee would haue to be propounded. Hee did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what hee had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed betwene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation vnto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest hee with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, he protested, that afterwards it would be vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaim the warre, as hee to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and ordained, That vnto threen Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

This beganne a great noyse of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all vpon them. But while these were vaine-ly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Aetolians to their partie: that contrarie to their olde manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip wonne the Townes of Maronea and Amyus, with many other strong places about the Hellepont. Likewise passing ouer the Hellepont, he laid siege vnto Abydus; and wonne it, though he was faine to stay there long. The Towne held out, rather vpon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, then any great ability to defend it selfe against so mightie an Enemy. But the Rhodians sent thither onely one Quadrime Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men; farre to weak an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadors wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much vpon them.

These Embassadors C. Claudius, M. Amylius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptoleme Epiphane King of Aegypt, to acquaint him with their victorie against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thanke him for his fauour vnto them shewed in that war; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Aegyptian King was now in the third or fourth yere of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philopater had done before him) he beganne a very yong boy. The courtesie for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, That out of Aegypt they had lately bene supplied with Corne, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the miseries of Warre had made all their own Provinces vnable to releue them. This message could not but bee welcome to the Aegyptian: since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that hee, or his Councell for him, should offer to supply the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadors both leisure and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Amylius the yongest of them should step aside, and visite Philip, to try if he could make him leave the siege of Abydus; which else he was like to carry. Amylius, comming to Philip, tels him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that hee had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, vpon whom he made warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the Towne of Abydus, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependencie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made warre vpon him: and that hee did onely requite them with the like. Doe you also (sayde Amylius) requite these poore Abydeni with such terrible warre, for any the like Inuasion by them first made vpon you? The King was angrie to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore hee roundly made answer to Amylius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (above all) your being a Roman; that maketh you thus presumptuous. But I would wish you to remember the League that ye haue made with me, and to keepe it: If ye doe otherwise, I will make ye vnderstand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassador; and had the Towne immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died euerie one of them, and set their Town on fire, binding themselves hereto by a fearful oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reasonable Conditions. But hauing in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meett by the Governours and Ancients of the Citiets change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whilst they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Heereof the King had so little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Athyenians three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towne; or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

The Romans decree warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athyenians their Confederates. How poore the Athyenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

THis calamitie of the Athyenians, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrell. But to help themselves with pretence for the wane, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that hee should presently imbarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal had from Saguntum in five months, but in the short space of five daies sayling. Thus P. Sulpitius told the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledg'd; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to vnder-take: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africke, to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrey. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleue, that this warre with the Macedonian was both iust and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hastned away towards Macedon, hauing that Province allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were giuen to the Athyenian Embassadors, of their constancie (as was sayd) in not changing their faith at such time as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greek Towne, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts, had reason to giue thanks vnto those, that ministered the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntuie suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italy; and since neither Attalus, the Rhodian, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to giue them protection: these busie-headed Athyenians, who filling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolemy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbors; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheless as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might haue argued Athens to be the least part of his care. Hee failed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the easie way to Macedon; and landing about the River of Asius, betwene Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there began the Warre. Soone vpon his comming, the Athyenian Embassadors were with him, and craved his helpe; whereof they could make no benefit whilst hee was farre from them. They be-moaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer

them. For which cause he sent vnto them C. Claudius with twenty gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces hee retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athyenians were not indeed besieged: onely some Romans from Chalcis, in the Ile of Euboea, and some bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vied to take their shippes and spoyle their fields; because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Townes. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athyenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrivall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easly presecuted them. As for the Athyenians themselves, they that had bene wont, in ancient times, to vnder-take the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cilicia, to make warre vpon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three shippes, and those open ones, not much better than long boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men, but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had bene still their owne.

The Towne of Chalcis in Euboea, taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprise: molesteth the Countrey about: and makes a iourney into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, and his wife. Philip offers to make warre against Nabis for the Achaens. Hee returneth home through Attica, which he spoyleth againe: and provides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Diuers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the warre.

Philip, returning home from Alydus, heard newes of the Roman Consuls his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to giue him entertainment, or perhaps before hee had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: he receiued aduertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athyenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the warre, and make his owne employment better. He grew loone weary of sitting as a Scare-crowe, to saue the Athyenians grounds from spoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemie at hand: and more negligently by the Towne men, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Heereof Claudius hauing aduertisement, layed thither by night, for feare of being decryed: and arriuing there a little before break of day, tooke it by Scalado. Hee vnder-tooke no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it, (vnlesse he should haue left the heartlesse Athyenians to their owne defence) Hee set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all provisions for Warre, which were plentifully filled. Neither were He and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their shippes, and with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despite and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in pieces the Statues to him there erected. This done, they hastned away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit was like to be ioyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter yet hee made all haste to take reuenge. He thought to haue taken the Athyenians, with their trusty friends, busie at worke in ransacking the Towne, and loading themselves with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed-foote hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leauing at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, Hee marched from thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not desired him a farre off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither : who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Cittadell to sound the Alarme ; and with all speede make ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there : who seeng the many lightes, and other signes of busie preparation vusual in such a case, vnderstood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compass about by Sea, and had no cause of haste) yet hauing in the Towne some mercenarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this, reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. Hee therefore onely willed his men to follow his example; and presently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight hee gaue singular proofe of his valour : and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great slaughter backe into the Citie. The heate of his courage transported him further, than discretion would haue allowed, euen to the very gate. But he retired without harme taking; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vse their casting weapons against him, without much indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monumentes besides, nere adioyning vnto Athens : of which hee spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the sepulchers of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Agina; too late in regard of what was already past : but in good time to preuent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet hee had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Acheans held a Parliament at Argos, He came thitherto them vexpected.

The Acheans were deuising vpon warre : which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon: who being started vp in the roome of Machinidas, did greater mischief then any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his Mercenaries; and of his subiects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedy extortioner vpon those that liued vnder him; and one that in his naturall condition smelt crankle of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apege was very fildly matched with him, since his dexteritie was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in flouting their wives; whom shee would neuer suffer to bee at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iruels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her propertie, that hee caused an Image to be made liuely representing her; and appparelled it with such costly garments as the vied to weare. But it was indeed an Engine, seruing to torment men. Hereof hee made vse, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose mony he was desirous; Hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfeit Apege stood, and there vse all his Art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speede, but was answered with excuses, then tooke hee the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apege (who fate by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So hee ledde him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nayles, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes : and herewith shee griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all herethat is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouernment. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Atolians, as Machinidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former war. Of Philopemens vertue he stood in feare; and therefore durst not prouoke the Acheans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cyclades, a farre worse Capitaine, was their Prator; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopemens being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloued occupation of Warre : then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their owne safetie in the Townes.

Against

Against this Tyrant the Acheans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had set downe, what proportion of Souldiers euery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thanks they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilst he made warre vpon Lacedemon, He ought not to leaue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect hee thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Ile of Euboea; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediately they found out his device, which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans: Wherefore their Prator Cyclades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis; hee brake vp the Assembly, with euery mans good liking; whereas in former times, He had bene thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Acheans. Neuertheless, he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philoetes one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had bene doing what harme hee might vnto the Countrey. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Haven of Pyreus, and euen the City of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into euery of these places; that he could no more then wreake his anger vpon those goodlie Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So He destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe bene masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choyce was found. Neither did hee onely pull all downe : but caused his men to breake the very stones, that they might be vnderlicable to their reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon : and there made prouision; both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infect him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Atolians : to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Neopatus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped vpon the riuer of Apfus. Thence hee sent forth Apustius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to wasteth the borders of Macedon. Apustius tooke sundry Castles and Townes; vntil such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which hee wonne by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vntil hee they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoyle, he was charged in Rere, vpon the passage of a brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian captaine : but the Romans had the better, and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty; with which they armed in safety at their campe. The successe of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Serdailidas the Illyrian; Aminander King of the Abamanians, and Bato the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their assistance vnto the Consul, who thanked them : and sayd, That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon; but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Countrey lay betweene the Atolians and Thessalie, might be perhaps auailable with the Atolians, to stirre them vp against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set vpon the Atolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and sayd : That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betweene his Master and the Atolians : so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to the defence of the Atolians; and yet notwithstanding had bene angry, that the Atolians by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection vpon those that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the same sort had they lent their helpe to the Mamertines; and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse & Messana, were subiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleaged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Ætolians: who if they drew such Masters into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherinto consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and send them such a Moderator, as went euery yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which still continued; although that the very same Romans were then against it, who sought to breake it now. It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good answere to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing wherunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were let on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of reprimandation enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few daies past, made Warre vpon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a signifi- full rehearfall of their owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might haue his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athen it selfe, together with Minerva, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue felt, if the walls and the Roman armes had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Armes, went roundly to the point, in hand. They sayd, that they had of late made Warre in the Ætolians behalfe, so and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselves, by alleaging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to giue them aide conuenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their War and victorie, vnlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their helpe ere it was desired, were themselves carried vnto the warre by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue bene the cause, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor shifted them off a while with a dilatorie answer: though he told his Countrymen, That by reseruing themselves, as till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That our much haste was an enemy to good counsaile: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, He passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude vpon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was vnlawfull to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

Philip was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their sollicitation of the Ætolians. Hee thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardani-ans;

Dardani-ans; hauing with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was iudged, as may seeme, that the preference of the Kings Sonne, how yong soeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least beleue, that hee was not weakly attended. And this may haue bene the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Ætolia by his father, whom earnest businesse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heracles, would serue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodian and Romanes, from doing harme by sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his journey Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armes met in the Countrey of the Deffaretij, a people in the vtmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candauia; that running along from Hemus in the North vntill they ioyned in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which hee had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driuen backe into their Campe. Now although it was so, that the King was vnwilling to hazard all at first vpon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no lesse vnwilling to lose too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would haue fought. He had found the advantage of a place fitt for ambush, wherein hee bestowed as many as hee thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines to prouoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themselves respectively, as opportunitie should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush, hauing fought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had bene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so boldly, that they draue him to an hasty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not staying to let them runne into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Armie, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer vsed before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce about foure score yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to assist the Romans, who had neuer seene any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilst possibly some were yet aliue, which had knowne that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greekes haue none. Philip had patience to let the Consul braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had greater neede to fight, than hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to lose time: neither could he without great danger, lying so neere the Enemy, that was strong in Horse, send his men to fetch in corne out of the fields. Wherefore he removed eight myles off: presuming that Philip would not adventure to meete him on euen ground; and so the more boldly hee fortified his Fortagers to ouer-runne the Countrey. The King was nothing sorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: euen till their presumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them careless. When this was come to passe, hee tooke all his horse, and light-armed foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betwene the Fortagers and their Campe. There hee stayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Countrey, to fall vpon the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields, lighted all or most of them vpon the King and his complices in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there escaped some: who thought they could not make any perf. & relation how the matter went:

went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse diuided themselves, accordingly as they met with aduertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were compassing the field, tooke their taske where they found it: But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disadvantage; as comming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellowes also might haue beene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an harvest, he was too greedie about a poore gleaming: the Roman Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse too make a charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to look to their owne safety. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are feldown heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had hee beene cast away, if a louing subiect of his had not alighted, mounted him vpon his owne horse, and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foote was ouertaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashnes; and the Con-20 sul, with as much dulnesse, for his dayes seruice. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the king from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needs haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought vnkely, That if the Romans following the King, had set vpon his Campe, at such time as hee fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might haue wonne it. But that noble Historian, Liue, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Armie lay safe in his Campe, and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the 30 King himselfe, he was aduertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardaniens, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him a dunce to doe somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleare himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose hee sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But instead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Campe to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He ouertooke the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they 40 had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vse; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for euery ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruicable in that case. But they were few; and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therefore helpe them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open vnto the Consul some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yielded for feare. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardaniens, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace 50 out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenagoras to waite vpon them home; whilst he himselfe went against the Atolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Atolians, who had refused himselfe and his Nation vnto the euent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once & againe: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardaniens were fallen vpon Macedon, grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had beene wise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaim warre, ioynd his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made inuasion vpon Thessalie. They tooke and cruelly cruelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to haue taken their Campe; if Aminander, more warie then the Atolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time, the Roman Fleete, assisted by Atalus and the Rhodians, had taken some small Ilands in the Ægean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Isle of Eubœa; and some other places therabout. The Townes were giuen vnto Atalus, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Atolians: the goods therein found were giuen vnto the Romans; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindred; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of means.

§. XII.

Vilius the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. Warre of the Gauls in Italie. An Embasie of the Romans to Carthage, Malinissa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

10 Thus the time ranne away: and P. Vilius a new Consul, tooke charge of the war in Macedon. He was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiours: whereof two thousand; having serued long in Sicil and Affric, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had serued at Cannæ: as may seeme by their complaint, of having beene long absent from Italie; whither faime they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Vilius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the History of his yeere is lost: whereof the misse is not great, since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as wee find in Liue, hath adorned this Vilius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Liue himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Author; 20 we may reasonably beleue, that Vilius his yeere was idle.

In the beginning of his Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could haue beene expected with the Gauls. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had bene able to force, was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saved her selfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that staid behind Asdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Capitaine of the Gauls, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderstand, That, if they were 30 not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made war in Italie. Hereunto it was added (perhaps left the message might seme other wise to haue sauoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitive slaues belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and downe in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored backe to their Masters, as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Malinissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Malinissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending then some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good of 40 50 fices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That haueing beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemy, Hee ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadors vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitives: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedonia. King Masaniassa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermius met with the Embassadors, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls: they layde siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius Roman Prator came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar, the Carthaginian died in this battaile; and the fruit of the victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should haue the managing of warre among those Gauls. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedonia: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his subiects, by punishing a bad Counsaillour whom they hated, as also to assure vnto himselfe the Achaens, by rendering vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Vilius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedonia, taking a iourney (as Salspius had done before him) where in hee could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedonia allotted him for his Prouince; whose coming was expected; and hee very shortly arrived at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a passage against Philip. The Thessalies wist by Philip, the Romans, and Achians. The Achians forsaking the Macedonians, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THE Romans had not bene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemy, as soone as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtle Greekes, the arte of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and stood indebted, many yeeres after this, vnto priuat men, for part of those monies that had bene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie auerse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driven the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse neede to relye vpon their Confederates. So they leauied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul into Macedonia. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred some ialousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost some friends, yea, perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadors; requesting that either they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who invaded it; or else that they would not take it vncourteouslie, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They saide, That it was not their manner to vse the ayde of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to afforde it; That

That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perwade an atonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carry themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these termes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius halting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the supply decreed vnto him, which consisted, for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had serued in Spain and Africke. He found Vilius the old Consul, (whom at his coming hee presently discharged) and king Philip of Macedonia, encamped one against the other, in the Straights of Epirus; by the riuer of Apso or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedonia, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and bene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountains, which diuided the South of Epirus from Thessalie, then should they enter into a plentifull Countrey, and which by long dependance on the Macedonians, was become (in a manner) part of his kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the riuer of Apso, running along through that valley which alone was open betweene the Mountaines, made it all a deep Marish and unpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocks by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assayed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemy, who neglected not the god or them that was very easie, hee was compelled to sit still, without doing anything for the space of sixty dayes.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the war might be ended by composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that hee and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would haue him to set all Townes of Greece at libertie, and to make amends for the iniuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late: but vnto such, as had bene long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, hee thought against all reason, that hee should relinquish his claime and dominion ouer them. He also said, That as farre forth as it should appeare that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoever, hee could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme conuenient in the iudgement of some free State, that had not bene interested in those quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no iudgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies bene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Townes, that he would haue to be set at libertie, the first that he named were the Thessalians: These had bene Subiects (though conditionally) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer since the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians, the King in a rage demanded what sharper Condition he would haue layd vpon him, had hee bene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Consul stroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to haue preuayled against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolue what course to take: there came to him an Herd-man sent from Charopas a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who hauing long kept beasts in those Mountaines, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore undertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should haue aduantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound:

bound : and being promised a great reward , in case hee made good his word , had such Companies as was thought fit , appoynted to follow his directions . They trauielled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discouered . When they had reconuered the hill-tops, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndiscouered by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Consul . Some skirmishes, whilst these were on their iourney, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonians, thereby to avert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as neare as he could vnto the Enemies Campe , and assailed them in their strength . He preuailed as little as in former times, vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the hill, and charged Philip on the backe, astonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to saue himselfe. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him : hee made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troups, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and prouisions : if not rather perhaps of his reputation, for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in feare, lest being driuen from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, vpon equall ground. Neither was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat he could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrey, carying away with them as much as they were able, and spoyleing all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their king) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him, which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to vsee any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grievously, that he was driuen to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrey, which had euer been well affected vnto him : so that a little hinderance did serue, to make him breake off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his kingdom of Macedon.

The Atolians and Abthamians, when this fell out, were euen in a readinesse to invade Thessaly ; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their feuerall Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans : they forelloved not the occasion, but made all speede, each of them to lay holde vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while : but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their haruest, could not find enough to maintaine his Army . Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes since had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to auoyde. T. Quintius wonne Phaleria by assault : Metropolis and Piera yielded vnto him. Rhage he besieged : and hauing made a faire breach, yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recollecte his spirits, houered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing wel-neare spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage ; brake vp his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meete him at Antigra, an Haven Towne of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth : which Countrey being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded ; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocis he wonne by assault : many were yielded vp vnto him for feare ; and within short space hee had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, ioyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleete. They wonne two Cities in Euboea; and afterward layd siege vnto Cenchree, an Haven and Arceall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprize did somewhat helpe forward the Achaens, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip : since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Achaens to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had bene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best counse to rid their hands of him ; whilst being intangled in a dangerous warre, hee wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practises to make himselfe their absolute Lord : His poysoning of Aratus their old Gouernour : His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people of their Confederates, and his owne dependants : together with many particular outrages by him committed ; had caused them long since to holde him as a necessary euill, euill whilst they were vnable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopamen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to friend : then did they only thinke how euill he was ; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that hee was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceiue how they stood affected : and therefore hee sent murderers, to take away the life of Philopamen. But failing in this enterprise, and being detected, hee did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly dry before, and prepared to burne. Philopamen wrought so with the Achaens; that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to with draw themselves from the Macedonian. Cyclidas, a principall man among them, and lately their Prator, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Ariftenus chosen Prator, who laboured to ioyne them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Achaens; making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achaens was held at Sicyon, to deliberate and resolute in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Achaens, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrarywise, the Embassadours of Philip, whom he had also sent for this busines, admonishing the Achaens of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadour, did no way aduance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Achaens to vnderstand, That hee, who could bee satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell ; who remembering the benefites of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preseruatiou of the ancient League. But in fine, the sence of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future, preuailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and partly had vied as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance, That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this warre. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into societie : with the Romans (because no League would bee of force, vntill the Senate and people had approued it) they forbore to decree any societie at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadours from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argiues, hauing done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councill, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with honestie thereto giue assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argiues had so little thanks; that all the rest of the Achaens may bee the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a Solemne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discouered it selfe so plainly, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Philoctes, a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither comming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude readie to ioyne with him, He easily compelled the Achaean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gaue him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie, whilst as yet with his honour he might seeke it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly be chosen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect vnto himselfe; and therefore thought it best, since more could not bee done, to predispose things vnto a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Laminian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulfe of Zithon, in the Aegean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian; an Embassadour of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Asiatians and *Achaean*s. Philip had with him some few of his owne Capitaines, and Cycliadas, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortal Gods; yet misdoubting some treachery in the Asiatians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans were, That he should set all Cities of Greece at libertie; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Rencadoes; likewise whatsoeuer he held of theirs in Ilyria; and whatsoeuer about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made, entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoyled in the late warre betwene them. The Rhodians would haue againe the Countrie of Persea, lying ouer against their Iland; as also that he should withdraw his Garrisons, out of diuers Townes about the Hellepont, and other Hauens of their friends. The *Achaean*s desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniuently, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their consent. The Asiatians tooke vpon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leauing it free; and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, whatsoeuer he held that had at any time bene theirs. Neither were they here withall content: but insolently decaymed against him, for that which hee had lately done in Theſſalie, corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when hee was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Asiatians, Philip commanded his Gallie to be rowed neerer the shore. But they began to plice him afresh: telling him, that he must obey his betters, vntill hee were able to defend himselfe by force of Armes. He answered them, (as he was much giuen to gybing) with sundry scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Romane Consul vnderstand, what manner of companions these Asiatians were. For hee said, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise the best of the Greekes; desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take spoile from spoyle: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Asiatia out of Asiatia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as Warre happened betwene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by sending voluntaries to serue on both sides, that should spoyle both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, Hee said it was strange that the Asiatians should bee so carefull thereof, since diuers Tribes of their owne, which hee there named, where indeede no Grecians: wherefore hee would faine know, whether the Romanes would giue him leaue to make slaues of those Asiatians, which were no Greekes. Titus hereat smiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Asiatians well ratled vp; touching whom hee began to vnderstand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that generall demand of setting all Greece at libertie, Philip acknowledged, that it might well become the greatnesse of the Romans; though hee would also consider, what might become his owne dignitie. But that the Asiatians, Rhodians, and other pettie Estates, should thus presume, vnder countenance of the Romanes, to take vpon them, as if by their great might hee should bee therunto compelled: it was, hee saide, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The *Achaean*s hee charged with much ingratitude; reciting against them some Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honors. Next hee he said, that he would render Argos vnto them: but, as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himselfe.

Thus

Thus hee addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman Generall; vnto whom if hee could giue satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late warre, (hee said) was onely defense; they hauing bene the offerers: or if he gaue them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than hee at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Groue, and pleasant walkes thereabouts: what could hee doe more, than send Gardiners thither with young plants; if some King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus hee iested the matter out: but offered neuertheless, in honour of the Romans, to giue backe the Region of Peloponnesus to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his; whereof hee had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and hee ill provided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being soill provided of Counsaile, said Titus, you may euen thanke your selfe; as hauing murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the waightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was beleueed, that hee thereby sought too abridge the Asiatians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired conference in priuate with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That hee would giue the *Achaean*s both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Asiatians, that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoeuer they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which hee now rendered vp. The noise that they made came to *Philip*s care: who therupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, he would suffer himselfe to bee perswaded by them. So the third day they mette early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendered; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadours to Rome, where he would referre himselfe to the cōsuetude of the Senate.

This was such as Quintus would haue it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the warre. So he easily preuailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vnfit for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in Warre or peace. Further hee willed them to send their severall Embassadours to Rome, which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the rest he perswaded Aminander, to make a journey to Rome in person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadours, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Cite. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armes in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet hee knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alledged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadour of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate, which was more desirous of victorie, than of fauour. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vnder-taking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could neuer bee effected; vntill especiall care were taken, that the King should bee dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrie, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruilitie, that the Senate agreed to haue it eue so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadours of Philip were brought in, and beganne to haue made a long Oration; they were bricfly cut off in the middelt of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yield up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the King

King

King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors haue truly said, That neither the Aetolians, Achaens, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrius should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any claime to either of these Townes: As for Corinth, whereto the Achaens had some right, (though their right were no better, than that, hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain vnto an Other.) Philip had already condescended to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue bene alleadged, euen against the Greekes, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a Succesfull had bene decreed vnto him. But since he was appointed to continue General: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadors into Greece, cared to giue care vnto any talke of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Achaens had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common Enemies; thought euen to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedaemonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had bene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achaens together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though stiling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achaens: and therefore came to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be wonne. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be assigned ouer into his hands, in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tie him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appoynted to deal with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a straight alliance with the Lacedaemonian, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vntill by decree of the Citizens themselves he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argiues; but found them so averse; that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to robbe and fleece them. So hee willed Philocles, without more ado, to make ouer the Towne which hee was ready to receiue. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night, and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argiues; who for very loue had forsaken the Achaens, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staid behinde, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of monies was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more ado. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or played the theues, id purloining their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the whole multitude: abrogating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath bene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, he sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to ioine with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse ouer the Straights into Peloponnesus, there to meete with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauil touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans fixe hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also hee agreed with the Achaens, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the final conclusion of peace betwene them vntill the Warre of Philip should be ended, which after this continued not long.

§. XIII.

The battaile at Cynosephala, wherin Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as soone as hee vnderstood that he was appointed to haue Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwards wholly to relie vpon himselfe.

Titus had in his Armie about fixe and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemy intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessalie, and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to haue met vnawares, neere vnto the Citie of Phere: where the vancorriers on both sides discovered each other, and sent word thereof vnto their seuerall Captaines. But neither of them were ouer hasty, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their seuerall Campes, with little advantage vnto either side. The Country about Phere was thickest with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it vnproper for serue of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue backe into Sotusa in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully serued with all necessities. Titus conceiued aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it onely to waste the Country. There lay betwene them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neuenthelesse they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where hee found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discouersers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Aetolians had not bene desperate, the Romans their fellowes had bene driuen backe into their Campe. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thick and tumultuously, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his owne; if hee could vse an occasion, the like whereof hee should not often finde. This caused him to alter his purpose: in so much as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp those hills, which, for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynosephala. As soone as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his owne light armature were busie in fight, almost at the very Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. Hee had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serue best his advantage: forasmuch as the Romans were quite driuen from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie hee could make no great vse: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, seruing nothing apply for his Phalanx. Neuenthelesse hee found convenient roome, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the rest, embattailing them as they might. Whilst he was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to shrink; as being false vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driuen to recoyle. He set forward to helpe them: and they no lesse hastily draw vnto him for succour, hauing the Romans not farre behinde them.

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of a med pikes, like in all points to those which are now used in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner vnderd, as ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together vndissolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if the Romans gaue backe: euery one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come neerer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it, was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee obserued, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much vneuenness of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops, or else (which was worse) vpon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the worke, ranne foolishly along by the side of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder Hee made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against the ill ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were ready to dispute what should be done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as having no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeepe if they should haue done their best, it could not haue serued; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons vnsuifull. For let it be supposed, that Philip having fixe and twentie thousand in his Armie (as hee is said to haue beene equal to the Enemy in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine foureteen thousand Pikes; whereof he himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a phalanx, the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx hauing usually fixteene in File, must, when it consisted of seuen thousand, haue well neere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would serue, to make Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore as Polybius doth, to euery man of them three foot of ground: this Front must haue occupied twelue hundred Foote, or two hundred and fortie paces; that is, very neere a quarter of a myle in length. Such a space of open Champaine, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessitie disioyne this close battaile of the Phalanx; was not euery where to be found. Here at Cynoscephale Philip had so much roome, as would only suffice for the one halfe of his men; the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them, being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from cominging vpon them; nor found any difficulty in masting those enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the difcommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to giue backe; and the coming on of the Legions, to beate themselves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, seeing the victory on that part assured, left the prosecution of it vnto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, took in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainly helpfull to making of the victorie complete. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on so farre: as that himselfe with his fellowes, in mounting the hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand: and making downe the hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rear. The hindmost ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeepe saue the first file, were accustomed, when the battells came to ioyning, to carry their pikes vp right, and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconuenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it serued neyther for offence nor defence, except only in front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when hee was to fight with Darius in Mesopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the foure sides of it were as so many fronts looking sundrie wayes, wayes, because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet it is to be vnderstood, that herein he altered the vsuall forme; as also at the same time hee embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexanders men being thus disposed, were fit only to keepe their owne ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemy, vnlesse their hindmost ranks could haue marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselves, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The King himselfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euery where alike, and the day his owne. But hearing the noyse behinde him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went: when hee beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; He presently betooke himselfe to flight. Neither staid he afterwards in any place (except only a small while about Tempe, there to collect such as were dispersed in this ouerthrow) vntill he was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about seuen hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and siue thousand taken prisoners.

§. XV.

20 T. Quintius falleth out with the Atolians; and grants truce vnto Philip, with conditions, vpon which the peace is ratified. Libertie proclaimed vnto the Greekes. The Romans quarrell with Antiochus.

He Atolians wonderfully wanted themselves; and desired to haue it noised through all Greece, that the victory at Cynoscephale was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeepe the meit of the bootie; by sacking the Macedonian Campe, whilst the Romans were busied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vaine-glory, and at their raucous condition, purposed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceiued, That by viding them with any extraordinary fauour, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Atolians much more vehemently, than euer they had done the Macedonians. But this displease brake not forth yet a while.

After the battaile Titus made haste vnto Larissa, a Citie of Thessalie: which he presently tooke. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduertisie, he forgot not to prouide for the safety of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceiue, that he gaue them as already lost. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their Neighbors, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleete: and verie soone after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Atolians euer true to Philip; gaue vp themselves vnto the Romans, hearing of the victory at Cynoscephale. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Petrea, a Region of the Continent ouer against the Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: forasmuch as they aueried not the good leisure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, & some helpe which they borrowed of the Acheans and other their friends; gaue battell to Dinocrates the Kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the victory, & consequently recovered the whole Province. It angered Philip worse then all this, that the Dardaniens gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdome; waiting and spoyling, as if all had bene abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Army in all haste of sixe thousand foot and siue hundred horse: wherewith coming vpon them, he drave them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalie.

In this one enterprise He had successe and verieable to his desire; but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, hee thought it wise, to yeeld vnto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Limnaeus and Demosthenes, with with Cyclus as the banished Achaean, in whom he reposed much confidence, Embassadors vnto Titus. These had conference a long while in priuate, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seems that they had Commission, to referre all vnto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselfe in few daies after did. There was granted vnto him a Truce for fiftene dayes: in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman Generall. In the meane season many suspicious rumors went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates. Of these bruits the Aetolians were chiefe authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honestie, where profited them a wrong way, iudged alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters vnto his Associates, willing them to haue their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty should bee held. There when they were all assembled, they entred into consultation before the Kings arriuall, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every estate in particular. The poore King Aminander besought them all, & especially the Romans, that they would thinke vpon him; and considering his weakenesse which he confessed, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander one of the Aetolians: who commending Titus for so much as he had thus assembled the Confederates to aduise vpon their owne good, and had willed them to deliuer their mindes freely: added, That in the maine of the purpose which he had in hand, he was vterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greekes of their liberty. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the warre, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the faire promises made by Titus himselfe vnto the Greekes, than the chasing of Philip quite out of this Kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Aetolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the vter destruction of any King or Nation, at such time as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessitie, to take such a rigorous course. And heereof hee alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victorie, so generous minded, was onely an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publicke benefit of Greece: it was (he said) expedient, that the Kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should be vterly destroyed: forasmuch as it served as a barre, to the Toracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other sauage Nations, which would soone ouerflow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, wherewith hee had pressed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Aetolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure, to take counsaile apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phanaces, another of the Aetolians, to say, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no lesse than hee had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leaue his babbling, saying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip, were he neuer so desirous, should thenceforth not haue it in his power to molest the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vsed friendly: and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had been required at his hands; offering yet further to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phanaces the Aetolian, insulting ouer him, said it was to bee hoped, that hee would then at length giue vp to the Aetolians a many of townes (which he there named) bidding him speake whether he would, or no. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himselfe, said it should be otherwise; These were Thessalian Townes, and should be all free: one of them onely excepted, which not long agoe had refused to commit it selfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be giuen to the Aetolians. Heereat Phanaces cried out, that it was too great an iniurie, thus to bee defrauded of the Townes

Townes that had sometime belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather hee willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Couenant betwene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing saue the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had bene such a Condition in the former warre: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Aetolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vnderstand, asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be deliuered into subiection of the Aetolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted, with these angry passages betwene the Roman and the Aetolians: neither had they great reason to feare any hard measure, since Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to giue them libertie, though they had stood out against him, euen till very feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gaue their consent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

The chiefe cause that moued Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alledged; was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing nere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motiue; euen the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry Statues of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace, alledging friuolous matter of their owne suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, betwene the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to whatsoever was demanded, and the letters of Titus pressing them to accept his offer, on the one side; and the importunitie of the Consul on the other: who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People; by whose soueraigne authority it was concluded, That Peace should be granted vnto the King. So renne Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had bene Consuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very fauine haue retained those three important Cities, of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Achaens; and all the other Greece Townes which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next Isthmian Games, hee should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greece Townes which he held, and consigne them ouer to the Romans: That he should deliuer vnto them all Captiues that hee had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of warre, reseruing to himselfe onely five of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatnesse, wherein sixteen men laboured at euery oare: Further, that he would pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres following, by euén portions. Heereat Liue adds, That he was forbidden to make warre out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he obserued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already deliuered to Titus, together with his younger son Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, as such time as hee lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demetrius, who together with those four hundred Talents was giuen for hostage, remained still in custodie of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias King of Bithynia: giuing him to vnderstand what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoyled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bithynian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertie, and permitted to enioy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect effect these letters wrought, it was not greatly matterall; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they had not leisure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece reioycing at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the Ætolians found themselves agreed that they were utterly neglected; which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bæotians continued to fauour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselves. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; saying, that they were no better then lost, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to haue a hand in the execution, yet neuertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to haue kept themselves vndiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoeuer they durst not take Armes against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrey. This was detected within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bæotians, to haue the murderers deliuered into his hands; and for five hundred soldiers, which he had lost by them, to haue paid vnto him five hundred Talents. Instead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which hee would not take as good satisfaction. Hee sends Embassadors to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithall he falls to wasting their Countrey, and besiegeth two such Townes of theirs, as did seeme to bee most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Acheans and Athenians, (especially of the Acheans who offered, if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet besought him rather to grant peace vnto the Bæotians) prevailed so farre with him; that he was pacified with thirty Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them reioycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Ætolian would haue beene glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre serued as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to bee reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were neuer without great solemnity and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, hauing vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and liuing at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Loerians, Eubæans, Acheans of Phthiotis, Mægnetians, Thessalians, and Perrhebian. The suddenesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their owne eares. The Greekes were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thanks: which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-nere smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greekes, was like to be much more auailable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Provinces which were named in the Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hagesanax and Zylus King Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie vnto their Lord, That hee should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vexe them with warre: as also to restore whatsoever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomie or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe ouer his Army into Europe;

adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greekes; to the rest they gaue what they had promised. But the Phocians and Loerians they gaue vnto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wilddome to offend or much, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Acheans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the Thessalians, all saue the Towne of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had beene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earnestly about Pharalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and reiected vnto the Senate: for howsoeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should haue their will, as it were in despite of Titus. So the Acheans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeed (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocinthius) for that all which were partakers of the Acbaean Common-wealth, enioyed their libertie in an absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Ilyrian were giuen one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodian had borne their owne Caruers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victorie; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuen the Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubæa, to his sonne and successour King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubæans, should be suffered to enioy their libertie. Orestia, a little Province of the Kingdome of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yielded vnto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free estate by it selfe.

These busineses being dispatcht: it remained, that all care should be vsed, not how to auoid the warre with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperitie. Wherefore Embassadors were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to picke matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to predispose them vnto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Warres of the Romans with ANTIOCHVS
the Great, and his adherents.

S. I.

What Kings, of the races of Seleucus and Ptolomie, reigned in Asia and Egypte before Antiochus the great.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; hauing (as is saide) beene warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fall place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath beene preferred, or any mischance auoyded, by the predictions of such Diuellish Oracles. Rather I beleue, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue beene ante-dared by their Priests or by others; which deuised them after the manner.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloued of his Father; who surrendered vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonica, when hee vnderstood how much the yong Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolomy Ceraunus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be vntreueged by this his Successor.

But

But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with faire words; containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ceraneus enioy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the blood of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queene Stratonice in his Fathers life; yet out of modestie he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that reuenge, whereunto Nature should haue vrged him. Afterwards hee had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Also Lutaris and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gaulles, were fter upon him by the same Nicomedes. With these hee fought a great battaile: wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all aduantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which afflicted both their Horses and them, hee wonne the Victorie. He tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolomie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he soon gave it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his Historie of Assyria: the same, which hath since bene excellently falsified by the Frier Amnius. Hee left behinde him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeere of the Kingdome of the Greekes, when he had reigned nineteene yeeres.

Antiochus, surname d Theos, or the god, had this vaine and impious title giuen to him, 20 by flatterie of the Milefians; whom hee deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. Hee held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolomie Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wite Berenice the daughter of Ptolomie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierome and other Interpreters haue vnderstood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South, shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolomie Philadelphus was a great loue of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arfinoe) a very excellent Prince: howeouer, the worst of all that race. It was Hee, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, Hee sent vnto Elezazar then high Priest of the Jewes, for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Jewes, had formerly bene very great: for Hee had set at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in slaueerie throughout all Egypt; and hee had sent vnto the Temple of God in Hierusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Elezazar yeelding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolomie caused to be translated into Greek, by seuentie two of the most graue and learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72 Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seuentic; Iesus the sonne of Syrach, is thought by Genebrard to haue bene one: who that hee liued in this Age, it seemes to me very sufficient- 40 ly hee proued by Iamnius, in his Preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as Iosephus affirms) by Aristaeus that was employed therein. Forrie yeeres Ptolomie Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time where he ioyntly reigned with his Father. Hee was exceedingly beloved of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had bene in his former yeeres: in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to liue for euer. If this had bin referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue stood with reason: otherwise, the Gou- with which hee was often troubled, was enough to reach him his owne error. Hee was the first of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with 50 the Romans: as also of his Offspring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolomie. After his second marriage, hee vied his first wife with no better regard, than if she had bene his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet aduentured not to seeke reuenge; vntill her own sonne Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be King. This was two or three yeeres after the death of Ptolomie Philadelphus: at what time shee poisoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Seleucus her son, murder- 55

Berenice,

Berenice; together with a sonne that shee had borne to Antiochus. Iustine reports, that Berenice laued her selfe, together with the young Prince her child, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not onely some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolomie Euergetes, King of Egypt, came to rescue her with an Armie; though too late, for shee was slaine before.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding vnto his Father that had fiftene yeeres bene King, beganne his reigne. His subiects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they diucovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would haue bene much endangered, if Ptolomie Euergetes, who came against him, had not bene drawne backe into his owne Countrey, by some Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolomie, in defence of their owne King: but rather they sided with the Egyptians; who took Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as shee had well deserved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this inuasion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Egypt; went about a dangerous peece of worke, euen to make Warre vpon his owne subiects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had bin much better, by well-deferuing, to haue changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof hee was at such charges, that hee scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miserie. Herein hee embarked himselfe; and 20 putting to Sea, did meet with such a tempest, as deuoured all saue himselfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, hauing left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned neuerthelesse to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his Subiects vnderstood, in what sort the gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, presuming that hee would thenceforth become a new man, offered vnto him their seruice with great alacritie. This reuiued him, and filled him with such spirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Egyptians, hee made ready a mighty Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had bene at Sea. Hee was vanquished by Ptolomie in a great battaile: whence hee escaped hardly; no better 30 remed, than after his late shipwracke. Halting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemy would soone be at his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Euergetes, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeeres old, but extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great. Hee leued a mighty Armie of the Gaulles; wherewith hee set forward to helpe his brother, or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolomie being aduertised: and hauing no desire to put himselfe in danger more than needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeeres. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian Warre, but his brother Antiochus came vpon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to haue the better Armie. So 40 Seleucus was vanquished againe; and saued himselfe, with so few about him, that hee verily supposed to haue perished in the battaile. Thus did Gods iustice take reuenge of those murders, by which the Crowne was purchased; and settled (as might haue been thought) on the head of this bloudie King. Antiochus was very glad to heare of his brothers death, as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gaulles, his Mercenaries, were gladder then He. For when hee led them against Emenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsaile against him, and deuised how to stripe him of all that hee had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of 50 the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should be best pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransom himselfe with money, as if hee had bene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as rendered but little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to trie his fortune against his brother. Emenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great matter, since hee had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gaulles his owne souldiers, than of the enemy with whom he had to deale. After this, Eumenes wonne much in Asia, whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battell, fought betwene the brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which surname was given him, because he fought his prey vpon euery one, without care whether he were prouoked or not) soared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaulles. Having fetcht a great compassse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained very louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he soone perceiued: and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length hee resolved to bestow himselfe vpon Ptolemie; his owne conscience telling him, what euill hee had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good hee was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infideliitie can finde no sure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious & turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore hee layd him vp in close prison: whence, though by means of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, hee fell into the hands of the eues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Asaces founder of the Parthian kingdom: where in his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Asaces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, hauing cury way giuen him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappy reigne of twenty yeres. He had to wife Laodice, the sister of Andromachus, one of his most trusty Captaines: which was father vnto that Achaus, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became shortly after (as he stiled himselfe) a king; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice he had two sonnes; Seleucus the third, surnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeres in which time he made warre vpon Antiochus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of body through sicknesse, & in want of mony, He could not keepe his men of warre in good order: and finally hee was slain by trealon of Nicanor, and Apaturnus a Gaulle. His death was reuenged by Achaus, who slue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Child.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reigne. Of Ptolemie Euergetes, and Philopator, Kings of Egypt. Warre betwene Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Molo: an Expedition of Antiochus against him. The continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian warre: with the passages betwene the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemie, and Peace concluded. Of Achaus, and his rebellion; his greatnesse, and his fall. Antiochus his Expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fiftene yeres olde, when he began his reigne, which lasted fixe and thirty yeres. In his Minoritie, He was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that hee found in any of the Kings faithfull seruants. This vilde qualitie in a Counsellour of such great place, how harmfulfull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe; the successe of things will shortly discouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong Boy likewise, as hath elsewhere bene remembred. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus and the Achaens: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdom of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoyle which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to haue made war vpon the Jewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meer couetousnesse of mony, refused to pay vnto him his yerely tribute of 20. talents: but he was pacified by the wisdom of Iosephus a Leuy, to whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Calesyria, with Palestina & all those parts of the Country that lay neerest vnto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians; either as hauing fallen to the share of Ptolemie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished & slaine in the battell at Issus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and vnhappy reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betwene the Ptolemies and the Seleucide; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned fixe and twenty yeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtieth and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Sirach dares saith, that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth yere, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty yeres, were the yeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsaier, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Egyptians, for the recovery of Calesyria and the Countries adioyning. This counsaile was very vnreasonably giuen; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion; and fought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Country. Neuertheless Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained stiffly, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captaines that were faithfull, whilst He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe, a King. No man durst gaine-say the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenatas an Achaean, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebell; whilst in the mean season an Army was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Calesyria. The King hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and soouer the Deserts into the Vallie of Marjyas, betwene the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodorus an Atolian, that serued vnder Ptolemie. So hee consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came news, that Xenatas, his Captaine, was destroyed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenatas, whilst hee was yet on his iourney, and drew neere to the Riuer of Tygris; recieued many aduertisements, by such as fledde ouer vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills, drawne by their Commandment to beare armes against their King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt: lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessity. Xenatas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to passe the Riuer by Boats in face of his Enemie; left in the night time such as hee thought meet to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, in a place tenne miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment: but hearing that Xenatas could not so bee stopped, Hee himselfe dislodged, and tooke his iourney towards Media; leaving all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether hee did this, as distrustful the faith of his owne souldiers: or whether thereby to deceiue his Enemie; the great folly of Xenatas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenatas, hauing borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias by whom he was aduanced vnto this charge; did now presume, that all should giue way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of vsing the sword. Wherefore hee suffered his men to feast, with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Campe: or rather hee commanded them so to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish themselves against the iourney, which hee intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fledde. And to the same purpose hee busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily returne the same night. Wherefore vnderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste backe vnto them, that he came vpon them early in the morning, whilst they were yet heauy with the wine and other good cheere, that they had spent at supper. So Xenias and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered, without making resistance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tigris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to save their owne liues. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebell marched vnto Seleucia, which he presently tooke: and, mastering within a little while the Prouince of Babylonia, and all the Countrie downe to the Red-Sea, or Bay of Persia, hee hastened vnto Susa; where at his first comming, he won the City: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, he returned backe to Seleucia, there to giue order concerning this businesse.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marস্য, filled him with great sorrow, and his Campe with trouble. Hee tooke counsaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduised by Epigenes the best man of warre he had about him, to let alone this Enterprise of Calosyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need requir'd them. This counsaile was put in execution with all conuenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dissuaded by the way, and soone after slain, by the practise of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counsaile given, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the iourney against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more auailable, then any oddes which hee had of the Rebell in strength. Molo distrusted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good successe, nor any other consideration, would serue to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him to assaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discovered by some that fled ouer from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by some error, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quiered, when Antiochus appeared in fight. The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Molo, vpon confidence which he had that many would reuolt vnto him. Neither was hee deceived in this his belief. For not a few men, or Ensignes; but al the left wing of the enemy, which was opposite vnto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as euer they had sight of the Kings person; and were ready to do him seruice against Molo. This was enough to haue wonne the Victorie: but Molo thorned the worke, by killing himselfe; as did also diuers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne swords.

After this Victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married vnto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a sonne. Fortune seemed bountifull vnto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what vse he could, of her friendly disposition whilst it lasted: Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, He iudged it conuenient to visit his Frontiers, were it onely to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him. Hereunto his Counsailler Hermias gaue assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe. For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualtie: then made hee no doubt of becoming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Government. Antiochus therefore went against Arabalazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; hauing the greatest part of his kingdome, situate betwene the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very olde and fearefull; and therefore yeilded vnto whatsoever conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iourney Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly, how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous hee would be shortly vnto the Kings owne life. Antiochus beleued this, hauing long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for feare of him, to vtr his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, hee being trained forth by a sleighta good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to haue vied so much Art, in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howe euer he seemed gracious whilst he was aliue: yet they that for feare had bene most obsequious to him, him, whilst he were in case to do them hurt, was as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as hee had deserued, when once they were secure of him: Yea, his wife and children dying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wifes and children of the Citizens; wifol indignation brake forth the more outrageously; the longer that they had bene concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these Expeditions which he tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to haue invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and studie to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yet dissembled the notice which hee had taken, of these his traitorous purposes: but wrote vnto him, signifying that hee knew all; and vbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be vnpardonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traytor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recover Calosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong City neere to the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long hee wonne, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonos the great, who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Evergetes hauing lately won it, might, if it had pleased him, haue changed the name into Ptolemæis. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an candlelike memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatness, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the same greatness hath continuance. Theodotus the Ætolian, hee that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and desired Calosyria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now grown forry, that he had vied so much faith & diligence, in seruice of an vnthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercenarie, he began to haue regard to his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthy of these two Kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrrus and Ptolemæis. Whilst he was dealing about this treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemæis by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull then himselfe. But Antiochus hastning to his relieue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrrus and Ptolemæis, with a good flecte of the Ægyptian Kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Countrie, as emboldened him to thinke vpon making a iourney into Ægypt itselfe. Agathocles and Sosibius bore all the sway in Ægypt at that time: Ptolemie himselfe being loth to haue his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the sate of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might bee, for the warre: and neuertheless, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse, Embassadors from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyrenæ, as likewise from the Ætolians; according to the vsuall courtesie of the Greekes; desiring to take vp the quarrell.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sosibius: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsaillers perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victory would be their own; if they could get, for money, a sufficient number of the Greekes to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Gouverours of Ægypt were to be at quiet: wherunto he gaue the readier beleefe, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodesians, and other Embassadors, comming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him al after one manner; as being al deceived, by the cunning of Agathocles & his fellow: Antiochus therefore hauing wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not winne: and being desirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Seleucia, during the winter which then came on; granted to the Ægyptian a Truce for foure moneths, with promise that hee would bee ready to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as hee would faine haue seemed, but onely to lull his enemies asleepe, whilst he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achaus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Ægyptian would haue vied, He vied himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yere better serued, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, since Ptolemie provided not for their defence. Neuerthelesse, hee gaue audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Ægypt: pleasing himselfe well to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. Hee said, that it was agreed betwene Selenus his Ancestor, and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could winne it from Antigonus, should be giuen in possession to Selenus: and that this bargain was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Issus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Calisyria, and the Prouinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Selenus, by lending him forces to recover his Prouince of Babylon, and the Counties about the Riuer of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for peace, they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needs haue Achaus comprehended in the League betwene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seek to ioyne him in Confederacie with his own Soueraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrary to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemie, with a very puissant Armie, was coming vp against him out of Ægypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him the yere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuerthelesse he draue them: and, proceeding onward in his iourney, wonne so many places, that hee greatly increased his reputation: and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew nere together: many Captaines of Ptolemie forsooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Ægyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Ægyptians or Asiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arfinne his sister and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the braue deeds of his Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to vaile themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they beene fewer would haue beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the aduantage of those beasts, He draue the enemies before him; in that part of the battaile wherein he fought himselfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Groffe of his Enemies battaile, and won the victory; whilst Antiochus was heedlessly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field about seuentie thousand foot, and sixe thousand horse; whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not foure hundred horse; yet the fame of his overthrow tooke from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemie and Achaus, setting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Ægyptian to treat of peace: which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie to vex himselfe thus with the tedious businesse of warre. So Ptolemie, hauing staid three moneths in Syria, returned home into Ægypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subiects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achaus was not compitised in the League betwene these two Kings: or if hee had beene been included therein; yet would not the Ægyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was hee confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Molo the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwise, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cousin german to the King, as had beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemie of Ægypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if hee would meddle in that quarrell betwene his sonnes-in-law, hee had reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Ægyptian: He was not onely slothfull, but hindered by a rebellion of his owne subiects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Ægypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late Expedition; beganne to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferior to the Macedonian. Here vpon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercenary Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in straight subiection. Thus brake out a warre betwene the King and his subiects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might haue bene spent, as he thought, much better in retelling, or, as others thought, in succouring Achaus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Ægyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achaus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had put Achaus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres besieged. The Citie was very strong, and well victualled: so that there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Leagrus a Cretan found means how to enter the Towne. The Castle it selfe was vpon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Sauie, was in like manner situate vpon steepe Rocks, and almost inaccessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottom, wherinto the dead carcases of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, vied to be throwne. Now it was observed by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, vied to flie vp vnto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch vpon the walls, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, hee reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approved his iudgement, and gaue vnto him the leading of such men, as he desired for the accomplishing of the enterprise. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those Rocks, and whilst a generall assault was made) entred the Towne in that part; which was at other times vnguarded, then vnthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Craesus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse many ages past; and therefore out of memorie. Achaus held still the Castle: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the vsuall tediousnesse of expectation; his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, Arians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still incroched. But he thought it not safe, to let Acheus breake loose againe. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolemie the Egyptian, and good friends vnto Acheus, that made it their whole studie, how to deliuer this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed, that when he should appeare in the Countreys vnder Taurus, hee would soone haue an Armie at command, and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rocks, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which hee should receiue at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Antiochus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He vnderooke the businesse: and gaue such likely reasons of bringing all to effect, that they wrote vnto Acheus, by one Arianus, a trustie messenger, whom Bolis found means to conuiege into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Acheus held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in priuie characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none sawe hee and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew, that it was no fained deuiſe of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger; hee was a trustie fellow, and one whom Acheus found, by examination, heartily affected vnto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, That he should be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus 20 whom Bolis had wonne vnto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; vnder whom hee had the command of those Cretans, which helde one of the Forts that blocked vp the Castle of Sardes. Neuerthelesse other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himselfe to some adventure. When the messenger had therefore passed to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speake with Acheus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, save onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrymen,) some few excepted, haue bene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a consultation together, that was, as Polybius obserues it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safety of him whose desire 30 liether they vnderooke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That if of all the good & all they would equally share betwene them ten Talents, which they had already receiued in hand: and then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliuer Acheus vnto him, if they might bee well rewarded both with present monie, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a seruice, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad, than were the friends of Acheus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus 40 was to get vp into the Castle, and coniege Acheus thence: Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him very priuate audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberrall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptolemie whom hee had long serued; Hee accompanied Arianus vp into the Castle. At his coming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Acheus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But hee discoursed so well, and with such grauitie; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or iudgement. Hee was an 'olde Souldiour, had long bene a Captayne vnder Ptolemie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. Hee 50 had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other counterman of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had alreadie fundrie times giuen safe passage and repassage vnto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred vp some diffidence. Acheus therefore deale wisely, and sayde, That hee would yet stay in the Castle a litte longer: but that hee meant to send away with Bolis three or foure of his friends; from whom when hee receiued better advertisement, concerning the likely hood of the enterprise, then would hee issue forth himselfe. Hereby he took order, not to commit himselfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But as Polybius well notes, hee did not consider that

*Amongst these few I doe not except one, calling himselfe Eudemus. Idon Andreas a Cretan; who in one of his late shamelesse li-bels, wherein he traducth our King, Religion, and Country, with all the good & all they worthy misdeeds who he could learne the names, hath, by inferring my name vnto belied me; in calling me a Puritan, &c. one that haue been dangerous vnto my Soueraigne. It is an honour to bee dispoſed of by so diligent a supporter of Treasons and Architect of Lies: in regard whereof I may not denie him the commendation of Cretan: no lesse voluminous, than he in multiplicitie of name is beyond any of the Cretans in other times, that were alwaies Lyes, euil bests, and flow bellies. Hee Polybius liſt.

he played the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, That he had to doe with one, whose knaury could not bee avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had layd their plots thus, That if Acheus came forth alone, then should hee easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had troden it oft; and Bolis following behinde, should haue an eye vpon Acheus, to prevent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that being taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way serued, and Bolis in the Rere. Acheus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified hee the matter to his Wife Laudice; and comforting her with hope as well as hee could, appointed foure of his speciall friends to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone 10 took vpon him to haue knowledge of the Greeketongue; speaking & answering as need should require, for all, as if the rest had bene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuising vpon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise any thing to the mischiefe of another: yet could hee not see in the dark, nor know which of them was Acheus, or whether Acheus himselfe were there. The way was very vncaie, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to stay in diuers places, and helpe one another vp or 20 downe. But vpon euery occasion they were all of them very officious towards Acheus; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that he was the man: and so by their vncautionable duty, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait; Bolis whistled, and presently clasped Acheus about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus: who sat vp watching in his Paullion, expecting the euent. The sight of Acheus, brought in bound vnto him, did so astonish the King, that hee was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might haue kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes assembling his friends together, Hee condemned Acheus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pity towards this vnhappy man. Wherefore it was the general regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischieuous knaues against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Proverbe, A un traydor des alenafos. The death of Acheus brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that after a while they gaue vp the place and themselves vnto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

40 Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his Expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subiect vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government ouer them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard; (shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonos; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus: vnder whose posterity they continued vntill the Reigne of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustfull insolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slaine by the Gauls; did stirre vp Asiaces, a Noble man of the Countrie, to seek reuenge of injuries done, and 50 to animate them to rebell. So hee slue the Kings Lieutenant; made himselfe King of the Parthians; and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in bataille, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed. Hereby hee wonne reputation as a lawfull King: and by good government of his Countrie, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his Subjects, that his name was continued vnto his successors, like as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though they at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucida beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Armie, that that they durst not meet him in plaine field; but kept themselves in Woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and passages of Mountaines. The resistances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well fortified, as hee needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights between their Mountaines; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compass about, might either get about the Enemies heads; or come behind, and charge them on the backe. Thus did hee often employ against them his light armature: wherewith hee caused them to dislodge, and give way vnto his Phalanx; vpon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Asfages, the second of the name, (for his Father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelitie of his owne subjects; yet feared to encounter with so mightie an invader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and Deserts, would haue caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to giue over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out: Hee cauled the Wells and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemy must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoyled. By which means, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not preuaile, Hee withdrew himselfe out of the way; suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey: wherein, without some victorie obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Asfages was no thing strongly provided for the warre. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania; where hee wanne Tambrace, the chiefe Citie of that Prouince. This indignitie, and many other losses, caused Asfages at length, when he had gathered an Armie that seemed strong enough, to adventure a battaile. The issue thereof was such, as gaue to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Asfages craued Peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subject.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians: one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but hauing gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Euthydemus hee fought a battaile by the Riuer Arius, where hee had the victorie. But the victorie was not so greatly to his honour; as was the testimonie which he gaue of his owne private valour, in obtaining it. Hee was thought that day to haue demeaned him more courageously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His horse was slaine vnder him; and hee himselfe received a wound in his mouth, whereby hee lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, Hee withdrew himselfe backe vnto the furthest parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the Warre, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaying, That a Countrey of his was vnjustly vsurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That hee had wonne it from the children of the Vsurers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be re-tayned in order, saue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered vpon the Scythians, with whom if they should ioyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Prouinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his owne weariedness, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his Father as Embassador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little auailable vnto a good Conclusion: for Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to giue him in marriage, one of his owne daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the Kingdome, causing him neuertheless to deliuer vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselfe by oath, to such Couenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leauing the Bactrian in quiet, made a iourney ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophaganes, King of the Indians, the society that had beene betweene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subiect vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexander's death. Eumenes in his warre against Antigonus, raised part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victorie) turned Westward, and was ouer-busied in a great ciuill warre: then then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stirre vp his Countrymen to Rebellion; making himselfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title hee soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maiestie of a King. Finally he got vnto himselfe, (hauing an Armie of fixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had beene Alexanders. In this Estate hee had well confirmed himselfe, ere Seleucus Nicator could finde leisure to call him to account. Neither did Hee faile, or humble himselfe, at the coming of Seleucus: but met him in field, as ready to defend his owne, so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and amitie with him, taking onely a reward of fiftie Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian Kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of loue betweene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased therevpon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to haue some treasure sent after him, which he left one to receiue. Thus parted these two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any businesse worthy of remembrance with the Westerne Countreys. The posteritie of Sandrocottus, is thought to haue retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with Presents, and an Epistle written in Greece: wherein, among other things, Hee said, That He had command ouer fixe hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome, in diuers Ages, euen vnto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophaganes carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiuing Presents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the higher side of Taurus, humbled themselves vnto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his owne Greatnesse within few yeeres ensuing, by presuming to stand vpon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same indeed, that his was onely in seeming.

§. III.

The lewd Reigne of Ptolemie Philopator in Egypt: with the tragicall ende of his fauourite, when hee was dead. Antiochus prepares to warre on the yong childe Ptolemie Epiphanes, the sonne of Philopator. His irresolution in preparing for diuers warres at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. Hee seeks to bold amitie with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending neuertheless to haue warre with him. His doings against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

His Expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe awhile, and studie which way to conuert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeeres Ptolemie Philopator died: leauing his sonne Ptolemie Epiphanes, a yong Boy, his successor in the kingdome, vnlike by him to be well defended, against a neighbour so mightie and ambitious. This Ptolemie surnamed Philopator, that is to say, a louer of his Father, is thought to haue had that surname giuen him in mere derision; as hauing made away both his Father and Mother. His yong yeeres, being newly past his childhood when hee beganne to reigne, may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beastlinesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to haue done any mischief, whereof hee could be accused. Hauing wonne the battaile at Raphia, He gaue himselfe ouer to sensuality; and was wholly gouerned by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister; which had aduenced herselfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him vndertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenantships of his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices whatsoever; were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and of Oenanthe a filthy Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to the great griefe of all the Countrey, till Philopator died: who haue reigned seuentene yeeres, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanes a childe of five yeeres old, begotten on Arifnoe that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death, Agathocles began to take vpon him, as Protector of yong Epiphanes, and Gouernour of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemies the first, and

and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth vnto him his sister Agathocles, with the yong King in her armes; began a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the childe into the armes of his sister, but vnto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdome did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and as great neede was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to let the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witness, that should iustifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greedily he was hated. And so brake vp the Assembly: He that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified, thought to goe to worke, as had formerly bene his manner, by vsing his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumours, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old Kings name) to meete in knots together, and vicer one to another their minds; where in they had conceived extreame hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present iniurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moved with feare of hame; which, in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For hee was, though a man most vnapt for Government, as afterwards he proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these moriours wrought with the people: so by the remedy which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vnto vpror. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom hee suspected of conspiracie against him; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore Souldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparrell to be tormented. But whilest the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leaving Moeragenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the doores open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conueighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians; of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turkes Janizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellows had thus bene vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse ado than the Souldiours, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenante fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which he easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was flabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked vp and downe the streetes; as was also his mother, withall to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of iustice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochus; who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire, to get what part he could of the chilles estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themk liues, and craued helpe against these two Kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into couenant to diuide betwene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan; whose Father had bene Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian, He was very soone found bided, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Aetolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptians, was sent into Greece to raise an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not finde: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that He was sent thither only one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the Warre with Philip; as hath bene shewed before. As for Scopas, He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie: where winning many places among the rest of his Aids, He subdued the Temes; who seeme to haue yeelded themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such times as they law him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiving helpe from Egypt. But it was not long, ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next yeere following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cyncephalus, Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recouered all that had bene lost. Among the rest, the Temes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbear to invade; and gaue it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either hoping, as may seeme, that the Countie would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appears that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betweene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to afford him great advantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellestom. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath bene declared, seemed easily to be swallowed vp at once. One while therefore heooke what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Temes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptians) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make inuasion vpon Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadors, and desisted from that enterprise. Having thus farre gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitie betwene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpast, that these his Embassadors were louingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this and were of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, notwithstanding much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee sends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit he can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much inelosions, how notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their Kingdomes; hee offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie; and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus; seeking each of their friendshippes, at one and the same time, when hee sought to make each of them a spoyle. Thus was hee acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inspicible desire of repugnancies; which is a disease of great, and over-swelling fortunes. Howsoeuer it was; He sent an Armie to Sardes by Land; vnder two of his owne sonnes; willing them there to stay for him; whilest he himselfe with a flegion of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Egyptians. It was a notable Act of the Rhadians, that, whilest the waste of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gaue him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because he should not ioyne with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King: yet he tempered himselfe, and without any shew of indignation gave a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embassadors; partly vnto their whole Citie; by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire to renew the ancient Confederacies betwene his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his coming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly giuen to his Embassadors.

The Rhodians appeare to haue bene cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed betwene his Embassadors and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephale. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; vntill the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptoleme their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had euer bene greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of necessity, gave what aide they could vnto all the subjects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, betwene Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: Hee excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Phileteerus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make warre vpon Antiochus; and therein finally persuaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstaining from this affinitie, it should be in his power to ioyne with the Romans; and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as hee must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbor, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where he tooke such order as he thought convenient, for the reducing of Smirna and Lampascus to obedience; that had usurped their libertie, and obstinately strove to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed vnto the Hellepont: where hauing won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed ouer into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Cerberusius. Thence went he to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Asolians obiected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting therein a Garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, that his Garrison did not oppress the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his coming thither. For the Towne was utterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified: as also to redeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countie thereabout. Likewise he was careful to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Citie with the wanted frequentie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from coming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: hee tooke a iourne in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie, leauing the other halfe to repaire the Citie. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the convenient situation, and former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recover and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Selencus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearly pay: and as after that victory against Lysimachus, the death of King Selencus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Selencus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the same Countie, which was the last of Selencus his purchases.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their warre with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight vnto the King Antiochus. The Aetolians murmure against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Acheans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

Or the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their warre with Philip, could obtaine of them none other helpe against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe betwene them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inuasion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betwene them. This was whilest as yet they were busied with Philip; and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptance: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worke, but more plaine meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsaillors sent from Rome, required (as hath been shewed before) with a commination of war, this kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-proffered amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsaillors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visite King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnmindfull of the businesse: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assaillants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome of purpose, to deale with the King about those controuerfies, that were betwene him and Ptoleme. What other private instructions Cornelius had; we may coniecture by the managing of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Torrentius, hauing bene sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsaillors) from Burgilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesias and Lysias were also there: the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betwene Him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptoleme those Townes of his, whereof hee had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That hee must also giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and Hee done nothing? Further He warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally Hee demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iourne there was none probable, than a purpose to make warre vpon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That hee wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking

upon the matters of Asia: wherewith Hee prayed them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what businesse had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recovery of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countie, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie betwene him and the other Kings, had bene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had bene seized on by them, or by others from whom they receiued them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countie, were hindered by multiplictie of businesse, from looking vnto all that was their owne. Finally so he willed them, neither to stand in feare of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia, since it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vpon one of his sons, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Egypt, since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himselfe, and to ioyne ere long with Ptolemie, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refuse it; would needes heare further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampfacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampfacus being called in, beganne a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King be-²⁰ fore the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace; forasmuch as hee had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betwene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the warre by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied; and thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallo-Greekes, pretend onely the goodnesse of their swords; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of³⁰ their iustice, forbeare the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious ghesits; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome; and L. Cornelius, to preuent him thereof, and set the Countie in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassadour, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occasion to take leaue, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Ar-⁴⁰ mic; and left him to ouer-see the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces Hee tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence hee sent Embassadors to T. Quintus: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such sort, as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as hee was further proceeding on his voyage, He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aliue. This made him beare another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwracke, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatie at Lysimachia, (at least, so wife not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had bene sent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire societie with them, whereby they should be bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes a-⁵⁰ gaine. They who dealt thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were sollicit; and particularly the Aetolians.

That

That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the People of Rome. It was needlesse to say plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to haue well vnderstood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had bene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out that they had bene wronged, and defrauded of what was promised vnto them: vpraying withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their Victory ouer Philip; but euen for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they neuer could haue done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentle answers: telling them that there was no more¹⁰⁰ to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and vter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriuing at Carthage gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Ciuill administration; and giuen them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing subiect vnto them, the liues, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they vse this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should haue them all to be his enemies, which being once knowne, He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their im-¹⁰⁰ portant rule of the Citie, Hannibal was chosen Prator. By vertue of which Office, though he was superiour vnto them during that yeere: yet had it not bene their manner to beate much regard vnto such an annual Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must be accountable to them, if sought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Quaestors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Quaestor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For hee was of the aduerser Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Iudges; in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the spirit of future Greatnesse. But he¹¹⁰ had not to doe with such a tame Prator, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Pursuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into iudgement before a publike assembly of the people. There hee not onely shewed, what the vndutifull stubbornnesse of this Quaestor had bene; but how vn-¹²⁰ sufficient the insolencie of all the Iudges at the present was: whose vnbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrats. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable; Hee forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Iudges should be chosen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had bene passed, before hee passed ouer Iberus: it would not per-¹³⁰ haps haue bene in the power of Hannibal, to haue brought him vnto necessitie, of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leuie by Taxation layed vpon the whole Commonwealtie, as wanting money in their publike Treasurie, wherewith to defray either that, or diuers other needfull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publike Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes whatsoever; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So hee found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasurie: but that wicked Magistrats, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vse, were thereby faine to lode the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof hee¹⁴⁰ made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasurie were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessity of making such poore shifts, as formerly they had vied, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace vnill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods, an ill-¹⁵⁰ employed authoritie, both at once, euen when they thought themselves to haue bene in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by iniustice, and robbing the Treasure, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these enemies to the Barchines might well cry out, That hauing done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alludge, than their owne inuentions: they said, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beast, which would neuer be tamed: That secret messages past betwene him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complaine of idlenesse, as if it were harmful to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, euery one to 10 the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publicke notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to haue admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppresse, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him, the Man, against whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor uided their Victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embassadors they sent ouer to Carthage, C. Seruilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius 20 Marcellus: whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming; and, being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gaue out, That they were sent to end some controversies, betwene the Carthaginians and Masaniissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall vpon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Hauing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when it began to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed 30 Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There had he a Shippe furnished with all things needfull; as hauing long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So Hee bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey; more than his owne. Passing ouer to the Ile of Cercina; hee found there in the Hauen some Marchants shippes of Carthage. They saluted him respectfully: and the chiefe among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. Hee said, Hee went Embassador to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Iland to make a sacrifice; whereto Hee inuited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would 40 needs hold his Feast vpon the shore; where, because there wanted couert, He made them bring thither all their failes and yards to be veyed in stead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleepe; and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make halte to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassador: neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speede homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great a person was diuersly construed. Some ghesied aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where 50 he had bene seene: and then the Roman Embassadors, hauing none other errand thither, accused him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they onely diuerted the mischiefe by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate mistaking the while their purpose, and causing men to vnderstand, that He fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrans, by reason of affinity betwene their Citie, thought themselves to haue interest. Thence went heeto Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his sonne in Daphne: who friendly welcomed

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced them-selves, by discouery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrey. For it would not proue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make stout Souldiours of base Astiques; as it had been by his trayning and discipline, to make very seruiciable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardie, though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the basenesse of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a desolate and banished man; than had bin the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindring him in those actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victorie: or if it further serued to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse careful to auoid the war; then should it further serue, to iustifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that hee had any meaning to take Armes; vnlesse by mere violence he were thereto enuoyed. Onely the Atolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of inuouation, and therefore practising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them; they had of late beene answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsaillours. That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and vnadulsed. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to 30 fight themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrey. For the Atolians were wont to vpbraid the rest of the Greeks with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliuerers had layd heauier fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian; likewise, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greekes their chaine, and tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip made no delay in accomplishment of that which 40 was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrey at peace, both with the Romans, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus; Hee made it his daily suit, That the Peace betwene him and Rome, such as it was, might be confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neuertheless T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize vpon Greece, as soone as hee and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, Hee retained still in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, hee might the better with stand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Sutable vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the tenne Embassadors, that had bene sent ouer to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would que- 50 stionlesse fall vpon Greece: wherein he should find not onely the Atolians; but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, ready to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilst Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intenued to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprife in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his Hannibal.

Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarrance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also he knew that many of the Greekes would not be fony; though for his owne part, hee wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeeeres before this, as is already shewed, whilst he had warre with Philip: and had further bene contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Achaens; neither since that time had hee done any thing, whereby hee should draw vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achaens; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not only the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which hee there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than only the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilst the noble City of Argos was left in subiection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duly to consider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to be vnderaken; or whether otherwise to auoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who intaking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselves. The Athenian Embassador made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as hee could deuise. Hee gaue thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrequestedly they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was to heare, such notable vertue & high deserts ill spoken of by some: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imagination to foretell, what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would haue required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleasures already receiued. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Aetolians. Wherefore Alexander the Aetolian rose vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their City had bene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recouery of the liberty generall: from which honor they were now so farre fallen, that they became Parasites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would leade all the rest into seruitude. Then spake Hee against the Achaens, Clients that had bene a long time vnto the Macedonian; and foulders of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These, He said, had gotten Corinth, and must now haue warre bee made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Aetolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes bene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himselfe, but objected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; hauing bene alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could neuer be at libertie, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they secke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesse wherewith to finde themselves occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But as they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Aetolians themselves did promise, & would vndertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had bene reasonable, if they had proceeded of from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought so much with these Aetolians; as did their owne rauenous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselves, that worke would vse it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had bene couenanted, That the Romans should enioy the spoyle of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in possession of the Aetolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole assembly, especially the Achaens, crie out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Aetolian theues bee enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Aetolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. He cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsaillours which had bene sent vnto him from Rome, to bee his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedaemonian warre; it was very soone ended. For Titus vsed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if hee should haue had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces; King Eumenes with a Naue, and the Rhodian Fleet, were inuited to the seruice: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get fauor of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achaens, who fit out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Aetolians: rather to hold good fashion, and sound their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achaens now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing remooued the Aetolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedaemonians; against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argines more bold then wise, began a conspiracie against the Lacedaemonians: that held their Towne, meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and slaine: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Armie to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no stir within the Walles: the execution done vpon the first mouers, hauing terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedaemon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof since the Warre was made, pittie it were, that the calamities of the warre should thereon fall most heauily.

Nabis had in readinesse an Army of fifteene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Fieue thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countrey; but such as were of all other the worst, as manumitted slaves, malefactors and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Assembly: and compassing their round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, hee said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemie. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and worke dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arrest beforehand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preferue not only the City and his owne person from danger, but them also for the punishment, which else they might haue incurred. Heere vpon hee cites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom hee leades away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was hee sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else doe than terrifie the people; who must thereby vnderstand, that it was a mortal crime to bee suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selfe vnto some some poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and flaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a fallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta: but ouer-ranne the Countrey; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time with King Eumenes and the *Rhodian*s, layd siege vnto Gythium, the onely or principall Towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Gouvernours within the Towne equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slue the Traitor; after whose death, hee himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Armie came thitherto Gythium: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermoost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne in law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouernment with a thousand Souldiers Mercenaries, and two thousand Argiues: it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gythium: which hee thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke vpon Enlishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassadour to Titus: requesting onely that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that he had sinned wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments, whereof the summe was, That whatsoeuer they now did, or could obiect vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alledged, they ought to make warre vpon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoeuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from entering into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with Tyrannie, and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, so far as much as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inuasion should be alledged. Wherefore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That hee had bargained to ioyne with Philip; when he was their enemie, not onely in League, but also in affinity: and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malta. Now touching this Piracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom hee had long held warre: it may seeme to haue bene objected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very frivolous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to haue bene mentioned. All this it seemes that Arsenus, the Prator of the Achaens, verie well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeare to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong; framed this discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his owne estate, and to settle his fortunes, whilest he might do it without hazard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and liued in great securitie, honour, and happinesse, as priuate men. Thus they discoursed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliuer vnto him in writing their other demands; that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in League all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon such Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending, Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. Hee would not suffer the Lacedemonians to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies; nor warre, either in that land or elsewhere; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne Lands; not to keepe any other shipping; than two small Barkes; besides many other troublesome iniunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be paid out of hand, and fiftie talents yearly, for eight yeeres next ensuing. For obseruance of these Couenants hee demanded fiftie hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to bee the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had bene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the warre from Nabis, because it was not grounded vpon iustice: then had it bene enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then should this enterprize, when once it was taken in hand, haue bene prosecuted vnto the very vtmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themselves by the spoyle of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Achaens, who iudged it euer after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister vnto the Asiatics, and to such as curiously picke into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Matterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedamon, once the most famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant; that had vsurped it but yesterday: and Hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himselfe vnmercifully dealt withall, by the selfe-same Romans, whose amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and assistance of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But filly had he dealt with the Macedonian: and fallly was hee dealt with by those, to whom hee did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him; save onely that for the banished Lacedemonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; hauing among them Agessipolis the natural King of Sparta, that being a yong childe was driuen out by Lycurgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no prauision, to haue them restored vnto their Citie and Estates; but onely leaue required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to lue abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to giue consent vnto these demands: and sustained an assault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would soone be wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly ouercame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yielding vnto all that had bene propounded, Hee deliuered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans farre more wicked than himselfe; and was readie vpon the first aduantage, to doe them all the mischief that he could.

The Argiues had heard newes that Lacedamon was euen at point of being taken. This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to set vpon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remoual of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly should fee their hands to the getting of it; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where hee was ioyfullie welcommed. Hee was deferredly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laid hold without staying for him; and that he might the better chide himselfe chetere, hee caused the libertie of the Argiues to be proclaimed at the Nemean games; as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Countrell of Achaia; whereby the Achaens were not more strenghtened, than the Argiues themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little businesse or none wherewith to set on worke his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace & friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed vnto quiet; Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vn sincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Aetolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Aetolians, and of thoroughly perswading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselves the Parronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrey, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation vnto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; hee called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There hee recounted vnto them all that had passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell, touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly hee gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achaens; 20 withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soon he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might bee knowne, what liers the Aetolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With ioyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that, which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransom and enlarge all Romans, that had bin sold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Countrey before his departure was vrged. Left therein behinde him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by ielousie & suspicion of any euill meaning. At his coming to the Citie, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three daies together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the spoiles of a Countrey, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Silver: some in the rude Masse vnwrought, some, in diuers sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of sundry kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were, carried an hundred and fourteene Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenus the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this Triumph; He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to Q. Quintius, and the ten that had bin his Counsaillors; because their businesse was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said vnto Titus & his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betwene the Victor and the vanquished; between those that haue warred together; were vpon equal termes of aduantage; or between those that had liued alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the imposition of some Couenants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had beene made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vsuall to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But betwene those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neither carry it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prebiding ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kinde, was the league & friendship that had beene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia hee should fet at libertie; from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes; eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintius answered, That since they went so distinctly to worke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore hee propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choyce whether to accept: Eyther that it should bee lawfull for the Romans, to take part in Asia with any that would seeke their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would haue them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoeuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampascus, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make warre with a King that sought their loue, and had neuer done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lysimachia, whercon of late he had bene at so much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopling it with inhabitants, that had all beene disperfed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alleaged: saying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to set at liberty those Towns, which the King would oppresse and hold in subiection: especially since those Townes were of Greekish bloud and language; and fell in 30 that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had afforded vnto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon haue left Antiochus King of not many subiects on the higher side of Euphrates. Neyther did they forbear to say, That, vnlesse hee would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might bee vnderstood) with such as were his subiects. Wherefore they vrged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not heretoe make; little wanted of giuing presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, and were contented once againe to send ouer P. Villius, and others that had been 40 already with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receiue a finall answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yes, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him liue in peace.

§. V.

Of the long warres which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Manassilla to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans 50 for iustice in vaine.

THE Insubrians, Boians, and other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselves were vterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the vey height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing served vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath beene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes,

Ch. 2. S. 5. of

Armes grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were readie to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpina now called Lombardie; it hath beene long since rehearsed, betwene the first and second Punic Warres. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrey, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would have bene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not beene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwaies made them to proceed warily, hauing an eye to the danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of bodie; so well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but forthwith ready to fight againe. Their Countrey was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor besieged. They were also very poore, and had little or nothing that might giue contentment vnto a victorious Armie that should spoyle their Land. In these respects, they scrued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiers to hardnesse and military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gauls, so their neighbours and companions, partly from their delight in robbing and spoyleing the Territorie of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begun, seemed to haue bin grounded vpon the Condition of all Salvages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgement; and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vsing their advantage, or taking reuenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betwene them and any of their neighbours, doe vie commonly this answer, it hath still bene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

• Diuers ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they fought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrey was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their owne Countrey they did little harme: not sending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make warre, save on their owne ground.

The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became subiect vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Prouinces, which was wholly & thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Ox-hide: and the Romans found in it the property of that Ox-hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardy Nation, and easily stirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (being divided into many small Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer provided in generall for the common good of their Countrey; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such priuate respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had vniued themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their oftentaking armes.

The Carthaginians had bene accustomed, to make euacuation of this Chollerike Spanish humour; by employing as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be vnquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and vsed them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which which they raysed vpon the whole Countrey; as being farre better husbands, and of more dexteritie than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwise the Romans, vsing the seruice of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Laines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much businesse with them. Spaine was too far distant, and withal too great, for them to send out Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwaies maintaine such Armies in the Countrey, as might serue to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captaines, as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and so thereby held the Countrey, though seldome in peace.

Very soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spaine against the Romans, euen vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to helpe themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Countrey, being well acquainted with the manner of Warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with subiection, brought peace vpon the Countrey; which lasted five yeeres. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the Warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the Warre; which after five yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards sought a battaile with the Romans Proconsul, whom they slew; and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happie successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to send thither to Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the yere following, and sent into that Prouince, found at his coming little lesse to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the paines that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great victory vpon the chiefe of them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him vnto much new trouble. Whilest he was about to make a iourne against those that were as yet vnsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were euen ready to rebell. Hee therefore dismissed them: which they tooke so heauily, that many of them slew themselves for very griefe. Hearing of this, and well vnderstanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietnesse, which they neuer had disturbed but vnto their owne great losse, He prayed them to deuise what course might be taken, for holding them assured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counsaile in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their inuention barren in this kinde of Subiect; Hee gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Armie of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countreymen: excusing the indignitie, such as it seemed, with a iest. That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should hee neede to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, hee could pay them with the Enemies money. Finally, He brought the Warre to so good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troubledome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by raising some Mines of Iron and Siluer to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Herein hee did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other vsfull qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seeme requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skillfull in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, & not vnprofitable in any businesse either priuate or publike. Many books he wrote: whereof the principall were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he liued in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sinceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, Hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he were neuer out of his Element. He loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that euen vnto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore & sixe yeeres, He pleaded in his owne defence: and foure yeeres after, he accused Sergius Galba vnto the People. So began the Nobility of Cato his family, which ended in his great grandchilde M. Cato the Pitan: one, that being of like vertue and seruencie, had all his good purposes dash't, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrie, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie seldome free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Romane Prætors therefore, of which two euery yeere 20 were sent ouer Commanders into Spain (that was diuided into Governements) did rarely faile of such worke, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One flew thirtene thousand Spaniards in battell: another tooke fiftie Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrie to sue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable seruice; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I haue already pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the businesse in Spain required not the imployment of a Romane Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, vntill the Numidian Warre broke out, which was verie long after.

In all other Countreies to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselves & their obedient Citie: Masaniissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrie the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leaue obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to allege, if the Judges had been vnpartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds had left them the possession of this Countrie: Masaniissa himselfe, now very lately, pursuing a Rebelle that fled out of his Kingdom, desired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise been questionable) that the Countrey was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniissa had wherewith to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Romane Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to vnderstand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill-affected to the State of Rome. There had lately bene sent vnto them from 50 Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined vpon some suspicion of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his shippe, had thereby afforded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe.

As for the Countrie of Emporia: it had alwaies, hee said, bene theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime vnto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citie stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leaue thereto build vpon so much ground, as they could encompass with an Ox-hide cut into small thongs. Whatsoever they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This considered, Masaniissa requested of the Senate, That they would not adiudge vnto such vsurers, the Countrie sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans hauing heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter too doubtful, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly; they sent ouer three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the 10 African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuersie: yet secretly giuing them instructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely, that Masaniissa with a strong Army should quickly preuaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from stirring in fauour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their final destruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leisure to expresse the utmost of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Atolians labour to prouoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to warre vpon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besiegeth Gythium, and wasteth some part of Achaia. The exact skill of Philopœmen, in advantage of ground: whereby hee utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romans, comes with the Atolians. The Atolians surprize Demetrius; and by killing Nabis, their Confederates, seize vpon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his persuasions annex themselves to the Achaians.

30 WHEN L. Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Atolians to thinke, that they who had promised vnto themselves the whole spoyle of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greekes, were not onely disappointed of their couetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vngrateful. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had bene taken from the Macedonian. This might haue well sufficed them, if their desires had not bene immoderate; and their indignation more vehemēt, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had vn- 40 scorable wrong. Wherefore they deuided, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what means they best might right themselves; and giue the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference, betwene their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemie; and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to ioyn all together in a new Confederacy: whose ioynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre surmount those of the Romans, Achaians, Rhodiens, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enter- 50 prise, which the Atolians tooke in hand; and well becoming them, for they were great soldiers. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with persuasions, as they thought, most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seeke any good pretence, beganne immediately to lay siege vnto Gythium, that had bene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achaians, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his dutie: neither would they haue staied long from repreffing his violence by open Warre; had not some of them thought it wisdome to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilste thus they spent time in sending Embassadors, and were aduised by Quintius to let all alone, and to waite for the coming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iuster cause of complaint, by waisting their owne Territorie.

Philopemen was then Prætor of the Achaens, who had long been absent in Crete, making war there for his mindes sake and recreation. Vnto him the Achaens referred themselves, giuing him leaue to order the warre at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all haste to relieue Gythium, by Sea; for he left the Towne, and the Achaen Garrison within it, should be lost, if he vied any delay. But Philopemen was so bad a Sea-man, that hee knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. Hee made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeres agoe beene counted a gallant vessell, in the Naue of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleece so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonians. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was stemed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leakes, and tooke in water so fast, that he was faine to yeeld without further resistance. Whenthe rest of the Fleece saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saved themselves with what speed they could. But Philopemen was not herewith danted. If hee had failed in Sea-seruice, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gythium, to stoppe the Achaens if they should invade his Countrey. But vpon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopemen came inexpectid; fired their Camp, and put all, saue a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched hee with all his Armie towards Lacedæmon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him that had already taken Gythium. It was not expected that Nabis would haue beene ready for them so soone. Or if hee should come from Gythium, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee must ouertake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some fve miles; hauing their Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vnderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custome of Philopemen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to make the situation of the Countrey about him; and to discourse, what might befall an Armie marching the same. He would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of Souleiers, ordered and fortified in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would hee put the question, whether it were meet for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? what peece of ground it were meet for him to seize vpon? and in what manner he might best do it: in what fort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Gard? in what fort encampe himselfe: and which way march the day following? By such continual meditation, hee was growne so perfect, that hee did neuer meet with any difficultie, whence hee could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Rere, Hee encamped neere vnto the place where hee was; within halfe a mile of the Enemy. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiours. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies wrote to water at one Brooke; whereto the Achaens lay the neerer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopemen vnderstood this; and layd an ambush in place conuenient; wherinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, hee caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitive, and tell him, that the Achaens had a purpose to get betwene him and Lacedæmon; whereby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recovery of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would haue bene forced.

Some

Some Companies he made to stay behinde, and flew themselves vpon the Rampart, thereby to concale his departure. But Philomen was not so to be ouerguiled. He easily wonne the Campe, and gaue chase to Nabis: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus disperfed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopemen conceived a right, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and saue themselves, when it grew dark. Wherefore in the Evening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chase whilste it was day, He led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinary passages vnto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiving in Philopemen Campe great store of lights; thought that all had bene at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them gorit into Sparta. Thirtie dayes together after this, did Philopemen waste the Countrey round about, whilste Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leauing the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be sollicitid by the Ætolians. Very faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoever hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receiue other fauours at their hands; and regaine possessions of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilste their Embassadors that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where hee had accomplished the marriage betwene Ptoleme and his daughter, together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings sonne, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadors, caused them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answers as at their setting forth. One thing that might haue bene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Linie rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discouered often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a vaine and vaine suspicion wherein he held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadors; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, which of all the famous Captaines that had liued, Hannibal iudged the most worthy? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrhus the second: and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldst thou haue said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the first place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadors, made him suspected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King: and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recovered his former grace, and credit. For hee told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when he was a little boy, That he neuer should be friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine surmises: but to know thus much, That so long as hee thought vpon warre with Rome, so long would Hannibal doe him all good seruice: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then should it behooue him to vse the counsaile of some other man.

The Ætolians, and their friends, were no lesse busied all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in mustering vp their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vinting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victory against Philip; that finally they prevailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, vnto which he would buy it at a deare rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian.

But

But in vaine. He vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their owne forces to the vttermost: as knowing, that althebut then must lie vpon Antiochus and themselves, without helpe from any; saue onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilst they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the businesse worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no small piece of seruice, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduerture. Wherefore he came to their Panatholium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serue to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprize which they tooke in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Countrey, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Masterie: the Ætolians, as Masters in that kinde of Fence, setting them on, and becoming the Sticklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and vrged them to such violent courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either pleade 20 their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired: than thus to set the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skiled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtaine what they desired, either as their right, or else by way of fauour. For with such termes had they bene treated once already: and were by the Senate reiected vnto Titus: who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This was onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoe they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as well to set the Countrey at libertie, as also to decide the controuersies depending betwene the Romans and Ætolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it; they forgot no point of brauery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if hee came to their campe in Italy vpon the riuer of Tibris. Gentler words would haue done better, as 40 the Ætolians are like to vnderstand hereafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more priuate Councell of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authoritie of a generall Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councell of Ætolia called) went as plots to worke as any of the yongest heads could haue done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden, entering, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had bene driven to flee thence, but was, by intercession of those that loued him, againe recalled. His Ætolian companions, that were 50 not many, seized vpon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not farr behinde them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Towne prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans; who more insolently dominated ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done: By which Rhetorick they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plain force.

force. For the Townesmen replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keepe them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor receiued iniurie. So this businesse was dashed. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis, their good friend, was Lord of the Towne, styling himselfe King: but, more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had wellnere lost all, by means of the ouerthrow which Philopemen had lately giuen him: since, he durst not stirre abroad; and daily expected the mischief, that on all sides threatened him. Wherefore he sent messengers, one after another, to the Ætolians, requesting them, That as He had not bene slow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduertured himselfe vpon the vtmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to send him what helpe they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to neede it. Nabis had bene often said, That the rauenous Ætolians were onely true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenarie forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way, and by so doing, to assure Lacedæmon vnto themselves. To this purpose, they lent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Damocritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the 20 Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to thinke that they were sent to make warre with the Achaens, or to doe ought else, saue onely what Alexamenus should command them; which, were it neuer so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they vnderstand, that vnto they performed it, they should haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with braue words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would suffice to tread them downe. As for the Ætolians, He said, that if neede should so require, they would 30 presently send away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they should raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater companie. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had bene long pend vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in worke of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside alone to his Ætolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he 40 saw time for the great worke that he had in hand: He then went aside to his thirtie Horsemen, and bade them remember the taske enioyned them at their setting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vnto they would anyone come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewith all the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and strucke him downe. The thirtie Ætolians neuer stood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any seccour could arriue, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ranne vnto the dead body: where in stead of seeking reuenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians hastened into the Citie, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers 50 as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Capitaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall stocke, that had bene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a good Horse, and made him their Chiefe. So they fell vpon the Ætolians that were idly stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with with not many of his Company, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedemon, Philopamen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexamenus should haue done after he had slaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safetie, to incorporate themselves with the Achaens. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Aetolians, and the small, but effectual, traualle of Philopamen, the Achaens made a notable purchase: and Lacedemon, that had hitherto bin gouerned either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, whereof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Aetolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages betwene him, the Aetolians, Chalcidians and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Euboea. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Aetolians, with the Ciuill answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achaens. That it concerned the Greekes to haue desired peace, betwene the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and amide vanitie, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Theffalie. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marieth a young Wife, and reuells away the rest of Winter. Vpon the coming of the Roman Consul all for sake Antiochus. He with two thousand Aetolians keeps the Streights of Thermopylae. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leauing all in Greece vnto the Victors.

Antiochus was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampfacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behinde him; and to winne them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he desirous with all speede conuenient to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore harie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was already vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Aetolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were ready to conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africke, there to molest the Romans, and so giue him the better leisure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Aetolian came ouer to him, and bad him lay all other care aside; for that his Countreymen had already taken Demetrius; a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence he might proceede as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without neede of vsing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vsuit man to be employed in the Kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly feeble the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing vnder such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as so if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal prevailed; Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should be alwayes neere vnto the Kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soueraigne Command, euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being iealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently

Presently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a friuolous pompe of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to Ithum; there to doe sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Aegean Sea, He came to Demetrius. Eurylochus the Magnesian, the same whom the Aetolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrius was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countreymen, in great frequency, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a signe of good lucke, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnesian was not the like cause of ioy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which, no more than fortie were seruiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and sixe Elephants. The Aetolians no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their Countrey. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore well on ward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Aetolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Countrell, He made an Oracion: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This, he said, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready; but hasted vnto their aide, euen whilest the season was vsuit for navigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, traualle, or danger, to follow the businesse which he had vndertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leaving the Countrey free indeede, and the Aetolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great: so was this his meaning, that all prouisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because hee would not be any way burdensome vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, hauing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprovided of many necessaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other vsuals, whereof he stood in neede. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a litle dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences betwene the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yeelde vnto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus in a businesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is merely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Countrell: the Aetolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might haue deceived them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had so fallen out? He could haue beanoed himselfe to Thoas, and complained of the wrong; but he must haue bene contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side, whom Thoas would therefore haue pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirrie Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Countrell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first vndertaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure neede to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Aetolia but a thousand Foot, leauing the rest behinde him at Demetrius. With these he hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Aetolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsfull, they said would neuer be obtained; vntill by removing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euery seuerall Estate had where to finde redresse of any pssure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuertheless desired them onely, so to ioyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans and Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thank the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacy. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept vnder, by any Garrison; or liued otherwise than by their owne Lanes, and without being tied vnto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliuer Cities that were already free. But since hee, and the Ætoliens, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Ætoliens, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leauing them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soone after, he brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeelde: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Eubœa being thus gotten; all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer-late to haue defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little Towne of Bœotia, lying ouer against the Iland; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the privilege of an inuincible Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seene, whilst others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himselfe in many vaine Treaties of peace, tooke advantage of their carelesnesse, and vied them with all extremity of warre. Very few of them escaped: fiftie were taken; and the rest slaine. Heretofore Quintus was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more iust cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece, in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wisest returned such answer, as the Cælidians had done. Some referred themselves vntill he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, He must hold them excused for not daring to stirre, or, if he came, the Romans must pardon their iust feare, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, ioynd with him in true meaning; save the Elcians, that alwayes fauoured the Ætoliens, and now feared the Acheans. Little reason there was, that he should thinke to draw the Acheans to his partie: Neuertheless he assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuie, which Titus was said to beare vnto Philopamens vertue, had bred a secret dislike betwene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Ætoliens sent Embassadors to the Councell at Ægium; that spared not braue words, if the Acheans would haue bene so taken. The Kings Embassadors told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming; reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimæans and Cadusiens; names that were not eury day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydaniens, Tyrians, Arabians, and Pamphylians were; such indeede as could not be resisted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the vtmost parts of the East; requested no more of the Acheans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilst Hee tooke order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Ætolian Embassador, and further added, That in the battell at Cynosephale, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both Hee and his Armie had bene there destroyed, had they not bene protected by vertue of the Ætoliens, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could haue bene desired. He told the Acheans, That neither the Kings Embassadors, nor the Ætolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discern; what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætoliens together. For euen such bragges as here they made, before the Acheans who knew them to be liars; had the Ætoliens also made vnto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory ouer Philip to be merily their Act: and the whole Countrey of Greece to be dependant on them. It changedeably had they bene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadors told euen now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimæans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaves, and good for little else. These diuers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diuersitie of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no such venter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that varietie, wherewith hee wondered, was none other, as his Host then merrily tolde him; than so many pieces of one tame swine, dressed after seuerall fashions with varietie of sauces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pompe: it were good to make iudgment of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyle, no more than tenne thousand men about him: for which little Armie hee was faine in a manner, to begge victuals of the Ætoliens; and take vp money at vsurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ranne vp and downe the Countrey, from Demetrias to Lama, thence backe to Chalcis, and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lies: wherewith since both Antiochus and the Ætoliens had each deluded others; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser mentooke heede by their example. To a fauourable Auditory much perswasion is needlesse. The Acheans did not loue so well the Ætoliens, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest obiects. Wherefore they stood not to harken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed warre against him, and against the Ætoliens.

How the hatred betwene these two Nations grew inueterate; sufficiently appears in the storie foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Parons; the one, the Romans, the other, King Antiochus. Herin did each of them wisely: though farre the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Ætoliens. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrey at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue bene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to retaine with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue fought, not how Smyrna and Lampsacus might recouer their liberty (which had neuer bene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countrey, as two Seas by an Isthmus or necke of land, might be kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiatiques, which originally were Greeks; than the generall applause, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should moue them to take armes euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell bene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Countrey, had bene farre from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Acheans were at this time, in a manner, the onely Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gaue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrell, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bœotians willingly receiued him, as soone as he entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in haerd of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had bene somewhat hardly vied. Aminander the Atthamianian, besides his old friendship with the Ætoliens, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himselfe to be defended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poore Court of Ashamania: where hauing made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedegree: He was iudged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto good title as he. But for the enabling of them herunto; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of seruice done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzic, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians that should be his subiects, or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynosephale, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit all: but King Philip tooke it in high indignation; as intended merely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them: wherein they should be pleased to vife him.

The Ætolians, Magnicians, Eubœans, Boeotians, and Athamarians, hauing now all ioyne with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge, as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long bene cast aside, as a vessel of no use; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now utter, was even the same which he would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before bene asked since their comming into Greece. For the Magnicians, Boeotians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly tooke their parts: what were they else than so many poore Elaters, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, allcading the same feare for their excuse? Wherefore he thought most behoouefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince, and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very strong Argument: though indeede what neede wasthere, of prouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said hee, These Ætolians here present; and namely, this Thoon, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motiues which he then vsed to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told vs that Philip was moued beyond all patience, with the Lordly insulence of the Romans: likening that King to some wilde beast, that was chained or lockt up within some grate and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry stomack, vpon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it proue otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoue vs to looke vnto him; that he may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your some Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage, let Seleucus be in readinesse, to fall vpon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other side, without passing vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip, and the present War in Greece. But more generally, for the managing of this great enterprise, wherein now you are embroiled against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: Wherein had you then giuen care, the Romans by this time should haue heard other news, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italie & Gaulle should haue been on fire with war; and little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that Hannibal was againe come into Italie. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet & Armie hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouths. Wherefore let the one halfe be employed against Italie, whilst you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen ready to follow vs into Italie: yet, and be ready to follow vs indeede, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice, who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of warre, yet bow to war with the Romans, I haue been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent seruice for the execution: but what counsaile soeuer you please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; saue only that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessalie; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the wals with his whole Armie. This his faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Proprætor did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemy vnto Antiochus; whereby the lame of the succour comming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more: than the succour could haue done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines toppes as farre off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had bene comming vpon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeere; He brake vp his sieges, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betwene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as hee could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiours as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise that when heooke the field, he might evidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Atilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and helpe him to reclaime them from this loose, neede of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to hauder exercise.

M. Atilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise H. e. was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of far less credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and respect, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should afford him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Bojans; wherein hee purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Atilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, & fiftene Elephants. Ptolemie King of Egypte, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Italie, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Ptolemie sent also gold and silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he wastoo yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his mony was returned vnto him with thanks; and his louing offer as being refused. Vnto *Philip*s Embassadours answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that hee should giue to Atilius the Consul.

Consul. Massinissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did stricke, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they would fend partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece. And here in Massinissa farre out-went the poore Citie of Carthage, as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred Horle, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vndertook to fet out a Fleet at their owne charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-mony, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yeerely pensions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Come; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it. 10

The haſtie and ridiculous iſſue of this war, that began with ſuch noyſe and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betweene the Roman and the Aſiatick ſouldior. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the ſame manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treaſon of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to proue their excuſe, when they ſhould againe forſake him. But King Philip and Babius, having recovered many places, and the Roman Consul being arrived, againſt whom none made reſiſtance; hee was glad to withdraw himſelfe. Aminander fled out of his Abamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enioyed; as in recompence of his good ſervice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of *Aminander*s wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking ſtocke, and ſent a-20 way priſoner to Rome. The Theſſalians vied much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gave vp themſelves: the Garrifons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne lives, and departing vnarmed: yet ſo, that a thouſand of them ſtayed behinde, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who having withdrawn himſelfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and ſaid, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of foyle during one halfe of a Winter, and ſpent the other halfe in ſuch Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of neede, hee could all the promiſes of the Aſiatics merely verball: and himſelfe reduced into rearmes of great extremitie. He therefore admired Hannibal 30 as a wiſe man, yea a very Prophet, that had fore-ſcene all this long before. Neuertheleſſe he ſent word to the Aſiatics, that they ſhould now make ready all their forces: as conſidering their owne neede to be no leſſe than his. But the Aſiatics had cauſe to thinke, that they themſelves were ſhamefully diſappointed by Antiochus: who having promiſed to doe great wonders, was in all this while ſeconded by no greater numbers out of Aſia, than ſo many as would fill vp the ſame ten thouſand which he firſt brought over. Yet came there ſome of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioyned with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better ſatisfaction, then that Thous and his fellowes had done their beſt, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came over to him out of Aſia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: hee ſeized vpon the Streights of Thermopylae; as meaning to defend them againſt the Romans, vntill more helpe ſhould come. 40

12. 3. 4. 6. 5. 3. Of the Streights of Thermopylae there hath bene ſpoken enough * before, vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas againſt the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may eaſily be conceiued, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and ſo came onwards into Theſſalie, were vnable to paſſe that Ledge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece; vnleſſe they could winne this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betweene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of theſe, with an handfull of men, defended this paſſage two or three dayes together, againſt ſo a World of men comming to invade the Countrey. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he liſted himſelfe in Greece: did commit himſelfe vnto the ſafety of this place, when he was charged by no many more than hee had in his owne Armie. There whileſt he lay, he ſent earneſt meſſengers one after another to the Aſiatics, entreating them not to forſake him thus; but at leaſt wiſe now to helpe, and keepe the toppes of the Mountaines, leſt the Romans finding any by-path, ſhould come downe vpon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thouſand, that vndertook to make good the ſe paſſages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficulty, it was poſſible for the Enemy to aſcend. The Roman Consul in like ſort, prepared to force the

the Streights: without ſtaying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by ſickenneſſe from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them bene Conſuls. Theſe he ſent forth by night with two thouſand men, to try whether by any means they could get vp to the Aſiatics. He himſelfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what baſe conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that ſhould bountifully ſeward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a fore-iourney (for what happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, ſaue onely that he failed in his intent) and ſo much the worſe, for that he had no ſkillfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp ſteepe Rocks and crooked wayes: he commanded them to reſpoſe themſelves; whileſt hee, being a very able man of body, tooke in hand the diſcovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himſelfe. After a great deale of trouble, he found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeede it was, the beaſt way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the ſame path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, becauſe in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no ſuch trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopylae bene ſo often the Seat of Warre, as might cauſe any traauilers to ſearch out the paſſages of theſe deſolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the beſt: yet did it lead 20 him to a bogge at the end, which would ſuffer him to paſſe no further. So he ſtaid there vntill day-light: by which hee diſcouered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and ſome of the Aſiatics very neer vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore ſet forth a luſtie Cruc of his men, whom he thought fitteſt for that ſervice; and willed them by any meanes to get him ſome priſoners. This was effected: and hee thereby vnderſtood, that theſe Aſiatics were no more than fixe hundred; as alſo that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So hee preſently ſet vpon the Aſiatics; overthrow them; ſlue a great part of them; and chased the reſt, that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was already begun betwene the Armies below: and the Romans, that had eaſily repelled the Kings men, and driuen them into their Campe, found 30 it in a manner a deſperate peece of worke to aſſault the Campe it ſelfe; which occupied the whole bredth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were beſt at that kinde of ſeruiſe; but by Archers and ſlingers that were placed ouer them on the Hill-side, and powred downe a ſhowre of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at firſt that the Aſiatics had bene comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Romane armes and enſignes were diſcouered, ſuch was the terror, that none made offer of reſiſtance; but all of them forſooke the Campe, and fled. The ſlaughter was not great: for that the badneſſe of the way did hinder the Romane Army from making purſuit. Yet this dayes loſſe draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence 40 with the firſt opportunitie, got him backe into Aſia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: letting open their gates; and preſenting themſelves vnto the Consul, in manner of ſuppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Aſiatics onely ſtanding out, becauſe they knew not what elſe to doe. Neither did the Consul giue them any reſpite. At his returne from Chalcis he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to ioine with him againſt Antiochus: ouer whom ſince the victory was already gotten, hee did congratulate vnto the Romans their good ſucceſſe; and offered to take part with them in the Aſiatick Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul ſhould beſiege Heraclea, and Philip, Lamia; 50 at the ſame time. Each of them plied his worke hard; eſpecially Philip, who ſaue would haue gotten Lamia before the Consul ſhould come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vied to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the ſtonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen ready to be taken, when the Consul, hauing won Heraclea, came thither, and told Philip, that the ſpoyle of theſe Townes was a reward vnto thoſe that had fought at Thermopylae. Herewith Philip muſt be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could ſoill endure to ſee Philip in likelihood of ſtriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himſelfe: vntill ſuch time as another Consul was ready to eaſe him of his charge.

The losse of Heracles did so affright the Aetolians, that they thought no way faster than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece, or if any thing withheld him from coming in person, at leastwise to helpe them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour, but appertained vnto his owne life: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Aetolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might serue to defray the charges of this Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aide, both by Land and Sea. Thonis, another of their Embassadors, Hee retained with him: who willingly stayed; that he might vrge the King to make this word good. But when Heracles was taken from them: then did the Aetolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suite vnto the Consul to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but said He had other businesse in hand; onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their coming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alleadge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euentimes, than to stay till they were reduced vnto termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselues vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing vnto the faith, signified, in their vse of it, little else, than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said Hee, I command you first of all, That none of yee presume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse priuate or publike: then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dicaearchus the Aetolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countreimen as haue followed him in reuolting from vs. Whilest he was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who had yielded themselues vnto his faith; not vnto slavery. What? (said the Consul) Doe ye stand to plead Custome with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought, and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euery one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apoletis or ordinarie Council of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions, without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause He entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

This surcease of warre, during ten and other ten dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heracles; when Philip had bene commanded away from Lamia, that else he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that he might not returne home with his Armie, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further neede of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Aetolians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all Athamanta, Perrhebia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Aetolians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that that Nicanor about the same time was come backe from Antiochia, with money and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heracles, and Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being farre gone thence. His monie Nicanor conueighed into Lamia, by very vnusuall dexteritie. But he himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Aetolians, there to make report of his Embassage, was very much perplexed about this iourney, which lay betwene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as faire as they could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but either to be deliuered vnto the Romans, or vled ill enough by Philip. But it seemed, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For He commanded his tribunes to entreat Nicanor friendly: and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as he rose vp: giuing him to vnderstand; That the Aetolians did now reape the fruits of their owne madnesse, forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselues contented, but would needes be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselues well in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus; but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection, vnto the other, would be much more auailable vnto each of them; than their mutual catching of advantages; wherby they had wrought themselues much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicanor to signifie vnto his Countreimen; and privately to hold in minde the courtisie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata; He louingly dismissed him. For this benefite, Nicanor was alwaies after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the war of Perseus he made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Aetolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: hee forthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whether hee therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceiued it: for it was a strong Citie, and well manned. But Acilius stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should haue bene a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So He staid there welcure all the following time of his Consulship; whilest the Macedonian King and the Achaens made farre better vse of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had reuoluted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong Citie of Demetrias, and with an hastie course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others: The Achaens called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long bene addicted to the Aetolian side, and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good words, wherby they saued themselues from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other helpe when the Achaean Prator wasted their Country, than to offer themselues vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Achaens it was not their meaning to yeelde. A message from Titus to the Achaean Prator, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annex themselves vnto the Achaens, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Miestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Achaens; yet could not like it well, that either they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon euent termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus which had once bene Philips, and was afterward giuen by him to Aminander who sent a Gouernor thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driuen out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Iland to the Achaens; whom hee found ready Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Achaens referred themselves vnto his discretion. So hee told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tortoyse, wherof Peloponnesus was the shell: and that holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger; but if they would needs bee looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having said things thus in Peloponnesus, hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glaborio the Consul had laine two moneths, that might haue benee farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which hee had vpon the Aetolians, or out of dislike of King Philips thriuing to fast: He perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitting themselves, craue pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Aetolians haue made such earnest suit as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glaborio had benee sure to carrie it, in any short space: it may well be thought hee would not haue gone away without it; since the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would haue made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came vnto Rome, no entreaty could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That either they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should giue approbation. They had not so much money: neither could they wel hope to bee gently dealt withall, if they should giue themselves away vnto discretion; which what it signified, they now vnderstood. Wherefore they desired to haue it set downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they should yeeld vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whilst the Aetolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to set things in order among the tractable Achaens. Hee would haue had them to restore the banished Lacedaemonians home into their Countrey; and to take the Elcans into the fellowship of their Common-wealth. This the Achaens liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedaemonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne meere grace. As for the Elcans: they were loth to be beholding to the Romans; and thereby to disparage the Achaens: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted; and saw that they should haue their desire, without such compulsiue mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Linius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans; though it was not great: and five and twenty saile of *Rhodian*s came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better offsaile; but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betooke himselfe to a speedie retreat.

And such end had the first yeeres warre, betwene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Aetolians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare, thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now send to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his younger sonne; whom some few yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard hee desired the Senate not to forellow time; but to send an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, wherein soeuer it pleased them to vie it, should not bee wanting. This Ptolemy was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of Fortune. He vnderstood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The same did Antiochus now begin to suspect, who had thought himselfe a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had bin in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italie into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soon be there, and make him try the chance of a battell for his Kingdome.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, hauing with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Aetolians, that so hee might as leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea; and diuers fights. An inuasion vpon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the siege of Pergamus, raysed by an handfull of the Achaens. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battaile of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their victorie. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph ouer Antiochus, is Iurned the Asiaticke, as his brother was stiled The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lelius. Lelius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Prouinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lucius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approoued well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time been put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controuersie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied vpon Hannibal, & should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had benee victorious against that same Great Worthy? But indeed a worse man might haue serued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation; where his wisdom was much approoued, but his libertie and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance; as a signe of the freedom that hee vied in his censures, even whilst hee liued in such a Court. Antiochus mustered his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may seeme, to haue made him wish, that he had benee serued by such braue men in Italie. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought, and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most courteous men in all the world: meaning, that all this Cost vpon the backs of Cowardly Asiaticques, was no better than a spoyle to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King, it is easie to ghesse. The little vfe that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the vfe of his seruice; when he stood in greatest need thereof.

The Scipio's made all haste away from Rome as soone as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the warre, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had serued vnder P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Amilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glaborio besieging Amphissa Citie of the Aetolians. The Aetolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not only fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left vnregarded the last yeere. Glaborio knowing this, deceiued their expectation, and fell vpon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went He to Amphissa: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the inhabitants, but they had a Castle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behaue of the Aetolians:

lians: entreating him to stand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words: and willed them to perswade the Ætolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Consul made still the same answer, with which they had been chased from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from warre: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpfull commoditie which time should afford. So they obtained halfe a yeres truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another halfe yeres leisure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought it all time lost, which withheld the Warre from passing ouer into Asia.

The businesse of Ætolia being thus laide aside: and the old Consul Glabrio sent home into Italie: the Scipio marched into Thessalie; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon & Thrace vnto the Hellaspont. Yet they considered, That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyalty of King Philip: who might either doe them some mischiet by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable aduantage: or at the least, would be vnfaithfull; though he were not so couragious, yet might hee take such order with the Torians, that euen for want of victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they should be disgracefully forced to returne. Hee had promised them the vnmolest of his furtherance: wherein, whether hee meant sincerely, they thought to make too some triall; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and obserue his doings as he should take them on the sudden. The King was merry at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom hee louingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what prouision of victuals he had made for the Armie, but how hee had made bridges ouer the riuers, and mended the badde wayes by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracchus returned backe in haste vnto the Scipio: who entering into Macedon, found all things in a readinesse, that might helpe to aduance their iourney. The King entertained them royally; and brought them on their way, euen to the Hellaspont: where they stayed a good while, vntill their Naue was in readinesse to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yere; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countrymen that had expelled him. Hee, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes hauing not as yet put to Sea; thought to doe some what vpon those that were so early in their diligence, before their followers should arrive to helpe them. Yet went hee craftily to worke; and sent word, as in great secret, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requittall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was beleued: and the Rhodian Admirall grew so carelesse, expecting still when he should receive a warch-word from Polyxenidas, that hee himselfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauē. The Kings Fleet set forth from Ephesus by night; and, for feare of being discovered, resting one day in a harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was ready to enter the Hauē. Pausistratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauē; so to guard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed some Companies, in another part of the Island: which falling vpon the backe of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and sunke or boorded all his Naue, siue excepted, that by a sudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresse vpon two poles, at the Brake-head: and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemy: who hauing not bethought himselfe what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto these desperate Gallies; for feare lest they should burne together with themselves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: wherof Polyxenidas could not take such aduantage as hee had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, Hee was driven backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they

they were not discouraged, set forth twentie other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great brauerie, presented battaile to Polyxenidas before the Hauē of Ephesus. When hee durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as cyther they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forsake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus waited all the grounds about Elea & Pergamus: and leaving his sonne Seleucus to besiege the royall Citie of Pergamus; did with the rest of his Armie spoyle the whole Countrey therabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; hauing with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore he had reason to stand in feare; being too much inferior in number. These came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Acheans: old souldiers all, and trayned vp vnder Philopamen, whose Scholler, in the Art of warre, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walls of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemy; began to disdain that such men as they should hold them besieged. For Seleucus his Armie which was encamped at the hill foot, seeing that none durst fallie forth vpon them, grew so carelesse: as oth'wise, than by spoyling all behind their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrey. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus: and told them that he would goe forth, encamped not farre from the Enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers, they wondered at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himselfe quiet, they made a iest of his boldnesse; and laughed to see with what an handfull of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his men to follow him, euen as fast as they well might: and hee himselfe, with the hundred Horse, brake out on the sudden vpon the Station that was next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their Horses readie saddled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make resistance: so as He draue them all out of their Campe; and chased them as fure as he might safely aduantage, with great slaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had couered the wals of the Towne, men and women, to behold this spectacle) were very ioyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these Acheans. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to helpe the Acheans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than he had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had staid many houres, looking who should begin: Seleucus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not while the Enemy was in sight: but as soone as the ground betwene them hindred the prospect, hee followed them in all haste, and soone ouertaking them with his Horse, charged them in Rere; so as hee brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heels, to their very Trenches. This boldnesse of the Acheans, and the bolenesse of his owne men, caused Seleucus to quit the siege, little to this honour. Such being the qualitie of these Asiatiques; Philopamen had cause to tell the Romans, That hee envied their victorie. For when Antiochus lay scaling at Chalcis after his marriage, and his souldiers beooke themselves to Riot, as it had beene in a time of great security: a good man of warre might haue cut all their throates, euen as they were tipling in their victualling houses; which Philopamen said that he would haue done, had He beene Generall of the Asians, and not, as he then was, a priuate man.

Antiochus was full of busines: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trouble, brought almost nothing to passe. Hee had beene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his sonne as before hath beene shewed, & went to Elea: whether he heard that Amphilus the Roman Admirall was come, bringing succour to Eumenes. There hee made an Ouerture of peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Amphilus, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul; this Treatie brake off. Then followed the the Overthrow newly mentioned; which caused Selenus to give over the siege of Per-gamus. Afterwards, foure or fife Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being offencen and thirty Sayle, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who together with Apollonius a Countrey of Antiochus, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could doe to Apollonius; and hauing the victory taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not faire aduenture vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Prefaces vnto the warre; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenides the Kings Admirall: The battaile was fought by Myonessus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenides had with him foure score and nine Gallies; and fife of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, where with Antiochus wanted the last yeere, That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodians, two and twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timberd and thin plankt, hauing all aduantage of speede, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselves by the same deuice; with which, fife of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemy: who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoysed saile: and hauing a faire winde, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet fortie of their Gallies they left behinde them: whereof thirtene were taken: all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellows lost only two or three shippes: but got hereby the absolute Masterie of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seeme to haue taken from Antiochus all vie of reason. For as if no hope had bene remaining, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: He presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily haue bene kept, euen till the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the besiegers (if the siege had bene continued obstinately) vnto termes of great extremity. He also gaue ouer the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought saue onely of defence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely cameto the Hellepont, but had yeelded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readinesse, to transport him ouer into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that Hee landed quickly at his owne good ease; euen as if the Countrey had bene his already. The first newes that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Embassador that came to sue for peace. This Embassador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Lysimachia, had bene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already giuen ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to strue with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with warre? If it was their desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should bee also set at libertie, or otherwise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, diuiding them from the King, might not be vncertaine; and it should bee quickly put into their hands. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, whereat they had bene in this warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselves content with these good offers, and not to bee too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune, He expected their answer. These offers which to the Embassador seemed to great, were iudged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his owne fault: and that He should not onely depart out of these few Townes, which he held in Asia and Ionis; but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keep himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. Whenthe Embassadors therefore said that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in priuate: and to him he promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne; who (it is vncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his sonne, than vpon Condition, That it might bee with making such amends for the benefit, as became a priuate man. As for the publicke businesse: He onely said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said to He, tell your King in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may haue peace.

The King was not any whit moued with this aduice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no lesse, than if he had bene already subdued: little reason there was that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to auoid it he must giue away. Hee had with him threecore and tenne thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fifty Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or sythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countreies. Yet was he nothing pleased, to heare that the Consul drew neere him apace as on chasting to fight. But howsoeuer he was affected, He made fol little shew of feare, so that hearing P. Scipio to lie sicke at Elea, He sent thither vnto him his sonne without ransom: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickenesse, and without not desirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his bountie to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein hee dealt craftily. For since he could haue none other ransom of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courtesie before the battell, as would afterwards haue bene little worth; than to stay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his sonne: so as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue bene much auailable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, Hee said onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by aduising him not to fight vntill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus refused to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the Riuer of Phrygius or Hyllus vnto Magnesia by Sipylus: where encamping, Hee fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul; and fate downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some losse driuen backe ouer the Riuer. Two daies were quietly spent; whilst neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the aduerture: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, vntill they came within two miles and a halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There as they were taking vp their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote: whom their ordinarie Corps de gard repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul tooke aduice what was to be done. For either they must fight vpon whatsoever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subiect vnto many difficulties: vntill they would staine their honour by returninge farre backe, to winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldier was throughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie, That this great Armie should be assayed, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to bee fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being very loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battells:

Sift

He

Hee also did the like; and advanced so farre, that they might vnderstand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Armie consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points, the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted form, were diuided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them follow the Principes, at such distance as was vsuall; and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Acheans; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vmoost of all (saue some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troupes of horse were placed there, though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Consul had with him sixteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they onely would haue feared to discourage his men; as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more courageous beasts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuerly appointed, and not so accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kindes, in such wise as each might be of most vse. The maine strength of his Foote consisted in sixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These hee placed in the midst, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one hauing two and thirty in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backs, and besides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in cury Tower, made agallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were sixteene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horse, diuided in their severall kindes, doe seeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue bin stretched out in Front. Adioynning vnto these, were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argyraspides, or Siluer shields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had served vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers on horsebacke, threethousand light-armed Footce, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Mysia; with foure thousand slingers and Archers of the Cirtians, & Elymaans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of diuers Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with hooks or sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sat Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serue to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrtians, Elymaans, and manie others, hauing all with them sixteene Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first on-set was giuen by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse: the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foote; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatened by them both. For with showtings, and noyses, and some wounds, they were driuen out of the fild; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this aduantage, charged vpon the left wing: whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order, others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with with such varieties of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fledde, in a manner, as loone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flanked with Horse: gaue vpon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Amilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threates made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach; Hee not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further tarrance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaile fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not flaine above three hundred Foot, and foure and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custodie of Sardes, and the Caste there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townesmen and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow, that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yielded vp themselves by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilst they were on the way. Neither were many daies spent, ere Antiochus his Embassador was in the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the answer, because that it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their charges in that Waite, they required sixteene thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thousand, in twelue yeeres next ensuing by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, very earnest they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian; and Thous the Atolian, with some others who had stirred vp the King to this warre, deliuered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily haue perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassador had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enioyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Vulso. The Atolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make warre vpon the Atolians; the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes that Antiochus was already vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to bee so thoroughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soone after this, came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yet by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to bee made with King Antiochus, there was no dilputation: it was generally approued. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned vp his own deserts; and comparing himselfe with Masaniassa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Nemidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masaniassa was onely such in title; and since both hee and his Father had alwaies beene their friends, even in the very worst of the Romane fortune. Yet was there much ado to make him tell what hee would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtesie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At the length hee craued they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giuing liberty to many of the Greeke Towns, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had bene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his ouerthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be true to the Grecian libertie; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bin subiect vnto Philip, and serued him in his Warre: which was not alledged against him as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the maine point wherein they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifullly gaue away so much, that euerie one had to cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had bene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victory had no less deferred; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Aetolians, and the Gallogreekes, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to haue passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Bookes of Heims; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Romans Nobilitie.

MARCUS Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge diuided between them, so which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Aetolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not fought to humble it selfe to the Romane Maiesie, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vpon the Aetolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadors were utterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie, which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become intercessors for them. Neyther were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deale, euen vpon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage.

Poorer King Aminander liued in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing bene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conuerfed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, vsed by the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They lent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vnderooke the worke. Yet assistance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. Hee was at the borders with a thousand Aetolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the readie assistance of the multitude, foure of the chiefe Townes in the Countrey to his vse. The same of this good successe at first, with diuers letters running from placeto place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few dayes; giuing thereby some leasure vnto his King to prouide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home fixe thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, hee left all saue two thousand behinde him, and so came to Athenium, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying ouer Argitheia, that was chiefe of the Countrey. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither hee, nor the King had the boldnesse to defend vpon Argitheia; for that they might perceiue the Athamanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come downe vpon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially when Aminander came in sight with his thousand Aetolians. The Macedonians were called back, from wards Argitheia, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and Aetolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine flight, with great losse of men and armes; few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Aetolians hauing found the businesse of Athamanian so easie, made an attempt in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilochians and Sperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip, from whom they diligently rescued, and became Aetolians againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had bene euer belonging to the Macedonians, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke Armes at first: but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbors ready to fight with them in the Aetolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the ioy was the lesse, for that now came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Consul his halting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuse to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despite, that hee had recovered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemed it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had bene the chiefe seat of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began; for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Aetolians: yet could not by them be relieved, vnlesse they would aduenture to fight vpon equal ground. To helpe the Ambraciens, it was not in the Aetolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Thyrians at sea, and ready to be driuen from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not bee terrified, by any violence of the assaillants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and to bee driuen to leaue vnto his succellour the honour of finishing the Warre. Wherefore hee gladly hearkened vnto the Aetolians, and bad them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouer-deare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. Hee also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediatur, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vnufferable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied those of the Aetolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a verie grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Aetolians were bound to vphold the Maiesie of the people of Rome; and to obserue diuers Articles, which made them the lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they hauing beene the first that called these their Masters into the Countrey. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacinthus from the Acheans, by stiffly pressing their owne right) that so they might haue possession along the coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbeare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philop. or others, might lay claime, there was set down an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to haue the Romans Iudges of their controuersies, when they should arise. And heere of good vse we see shortly made: when want of employment else where, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consul, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gall-Greekes and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio, of whose victorie, his acts were the consummation. He visited those Countreies on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at Warres, without regard of the great alteration happened in Asia. From enery of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrells found occasion to visite those Prouinces, into which hee should else haue wanted an errand. Hee was euen laden with bootie, when, hauing fetcht a compass about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gall-greekes. These had long domineered ouer the Countrey: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their fore-past acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they did serue vnder King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their lateitie, that they dwelt vpon the Riuer Halys, in an In-land Countrey, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had bene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yield: then there was no counsaile thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carrie or drine, to betake themselves vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should vnder take the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the natural strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or easily bee repelled; and that finally, when hee had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Gall-greekes had bene carelesse of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would haue serued well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of Armes, than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily preuaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gall-greekes, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor hauing prepared their stones before-hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensiu Armes, could not hold out against the Arrowes and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driuen from a piece of ground, which they had vnder taken to make good, vp into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steeperockes. Few of their men did escape aliue: all their wiues, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation overcome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saved themselves by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backs.

These warres being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsul, his Prouince for another yeere. Fulvius, in his second yeere, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to those whom he had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for feare of the Roman Armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid vpon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto hee swore, and receiued the Kings oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, hauing set in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellepont, laden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gall-greekes had in so many yeeres extorted, from the wealthy Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needefull vse, which the Roman souldier had bene wont to take as the onely good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous household stuffe, and slaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and in a word, with the seedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Countrey of Thrace lay between Hellepont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that hee passed through them, without any such bootie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with a huge traine of baggage, the Thracians could not so well containe themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philop. tooke it otherwise than very pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. Hee had cause to be angry, seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For hee vnderstood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Asolians; promising moreover to restore vnto him all the Greece Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to giue away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Chersonesus and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeede with his Nobilitie to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. Hee had entertained louingly the two Scipios, which he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was growne into neere acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spain and Affricke. This perhaps hee deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipios had not a disposing of that which they wonne from Antiochus: as neither indeede had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceede. When Philip therefore saw these vpstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, aduanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found hee great cause to wish, that hee had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that hee had ioyned with Antiochus and the Asolians, by whom he might haue bene freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be virged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleueed, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Countrey. They knew all aduantages; and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leaue behinde: though both the getting, and the sauing, did cost many liues, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew to night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus, and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly tax, as an unworthy Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that hee made good answer, and was approved by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to haue hindered the peace with Antiochus, they

they said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Armie over Taurus, and aduancing upon the calamitie threatened by Sibyls verses, vnto those that should passe the fall bonnds. What calamitie or ouerthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophetic threatened the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I do not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a fort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeede the accomplishment of this prophetic, fell out neere about one time, with the restitution of Ptolemie King of Egypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, owned at randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by euent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemie to his Kingdome by Gabinus the Roman, should haue any way betokened the comming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers haue bene well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that prophetic. Of the Sibylline predictions I haue sometimes thought reuerently: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe, and good authority. But obseruation of the shamefull Idolatry, that vpon all occasions was aduanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well preailled vpon my credulitie, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent worke of Master Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not onely those prophesies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was shewed, but euen the bookes of Hermes, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (who soeuer deuised them) by the vndiscreet zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forcine proofes. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historie, so reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue bene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Phylosophers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it bene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would haue abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of Simoni Sango: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebelle, had many ages before bene consecrated Simoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sango, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sango, thereupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Histori-call, than was conceiued by the Authour. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasurie, was made the last payment of those monies which the Common-wealth had borrowed from private men, in the second Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, euen so long as hee well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Polteritic. P. Scipio the African, with whom they beganne, could not endure that such unworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasurie, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answer came; hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middle of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Hauing audience, he told the People, That vpon the same day of the 10 yeere he had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punike warre, by a signall victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitol, and there giue thanks to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And hereto he inuited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the seventeenth yeere of his life, vntill he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had prevented the capacitee of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatness of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the 10 Court, followed Scipio, leauing the Tribune alone, with none about them, excepting their owne slaves and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement, vntill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vantage. A fourth day, after this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fill their thirst, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankfull Romans; that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Literum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many yeeres he liued, or whether he liued one whole yeere, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopemen, as also of his private behaviour 30 at Literum, render it probable, that he out-lived the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to haue drawn him backe to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was, the same Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the Asiaticke. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching money recieued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasurie; That the Senate should giue charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and iudicially determine thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and infligator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of singular industrie; frugal also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde 40 he was euen faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was hee vnmerciful and vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poisoned with enuie, troubled both himselfe and the whole Citie, whilst he liued. His mane birth caused him to hate the Nobilitie, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he care to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glubrio, whole Lieutenant he had bene at Thermopyle, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likly to carry it, hee tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perurie. That hee had not brought into the common Treasurie some vessels of gold and silver, gotten in the 50 Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipios grew partly, (besides his generall spite at the Nobility) from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was giuen vnto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That hee had no neede of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he published, or for want of iudgement, thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was fauourable him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall; whose noble noble deedes confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipios, whilest it was nourished by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuerer inquirie and iudgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was scene condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body should haue bene laid vp in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his haueing bene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had bene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had bene against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kinsred, friends, and Clients made such a collection for him, as would haue set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessity vsed, being redeemed for him by his neereff friends.

And thus began the ciuill waire of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not bene, or not bene much regardable, vntill now, since the Punicke Warre. Security of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especial helpe to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extreme danger. But these fictitious contentions did no long while containe themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrellsome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselves ouer-matched by their aduersaries, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubs & stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two sonnes, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receiue no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to haue wonne a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way, it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the ciuill warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who prevailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cesar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraine power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consul had finally cause to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in neede of a Soueraine Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were ouer-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Cesar, or giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith preuailling against his aduersaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedom, and became subiects vnto the arbitrary gouernment of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe even what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeede attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleueed of her selfe as if shee had, whilest a Kingdome crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequelle will discouer.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

§. I.

The Condition wherein these Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They deale insolently with the Acheans. The Macedonian, being overready for warre, obtains peace at Rome, by his sonne Demetrius; of whom thenceforth hee becomes zealous.

After the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Acheans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had bene, before the arriuall of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatiues belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraine power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie, and to relesse (as the French call it) the dernier resort, or the last Appeales, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeale, or last resort, as euery petty iniurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weale, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vterly dissolved. Neerthelesse it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Offices of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary; neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of seruitude the seuerall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankfull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly gricuous; or, as being skillfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chiete hope of thriving; or, as being more fearfull of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes liuing further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformity vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diuerfion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne cūen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auailable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) were they very louing vnto Masaniissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion seated in Affricke: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subiection vnto themselves, by the ministry of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were victual and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper, and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise constituted by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their Estate, and a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that he had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the wayes for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needefull, to transport them over the Hellefpont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the Sources of the Hellespont and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Amus and Maroneia.

Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These Townes of Enus and Maronea had bene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to have made himselfe Lord of Transluania: in which Prouince it is said,

Greece by Mart.
Emace, lib. 5.

That innumerable Medals of gold haue bene found, in theage of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victorie. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he liued not to settle his estate in Europe) tell to Seleucus Nicator by right of war, in wherein he vanquished and slue Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptoleme Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwile busied. The furie of the Gauls being ouer-past, those Countreies which lately had bene oppressed by them, recoverd their libertie; and not onely held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their advantages, and make vse of them, even vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, King Philip did prouide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Asolians, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Hereunto hee made a good answer, That his Garrison did onely saue it from the Thracians: who, as soone as he thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Enus and Maronea. That they were places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not auayled him, in the disputation about Lysimachia; and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrey thereabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their victory had gotten vnto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition. Whether Enus and Maronea should be set at libertie: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes, who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonesus, that were already by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges betweene him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Neuerthelesse, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Asolians: wherein whatsoever hee had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which hee had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more. By such allegations either he was likely to preuaile, or at least wile to gaine time, wherein he might bebinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had bene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselves, in pleading against him for their liberty, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature he was very cruel) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little ioy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians

cians by night, that they might sacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done: but to all taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue bene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Maestie, to an accompt. He would haue remoued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euenvpon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadors to enquire, among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who suruiued, were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more seuerer, and more thoroughly informed in the businesse, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, that if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not bene at Maronea, nor neere to it, hee requested them not to prisse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because hee should tell no tales; hee tooke order to haue him paysoned by the way. By this wee see, that the doctrine, which Machi- and taught vnto Cesar Borgia, to employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe, was not of his owne inuention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodly policie, the later hauing bene apt schoolers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth here in England, can beare good witness; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had devised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before hee was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his yonger sonne Demetrius as Embassador vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints, and wishall to deliuer his owne grievances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that hee had bene strongly wrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate; as hauing bene well approued by them, when he was hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat where it onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilst this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilst hee, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had bene Iudges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece, and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedemonians against the Achaens. It was objected vnto the Achaens, That they had committed a grievous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedemon: That vnto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the wallles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Praetor of the Achaens, made answer, That these banished Lacedemonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them; were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamefully they so laid the blame vpon others: the Achaens hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, they were supposed to be chief authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, as they were coming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the wallles of Lacedemon, hee said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibit vnto them all kindes of fortifications: as the Retreats and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedemon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vsurers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built the wals

and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his ordinances; and governed the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Achaens; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedemonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly tolde App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countreimen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answere and giue account of their actions, as vassals and slaves to the People of Rome. For if they were indeede at libertie: why might not the Achaens as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedemon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatnesse, to and intimate as they beganne, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Achaens haue recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without perurie could not be violated; as reuencening, and indeede fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answere of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state vpon him, he pronounced more like a Master than a Iudge, That if the Achaens would not be ruled by faire meanes, and earne thanks whilst they might; they should be compelled with a mischief, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achaens; which agreed to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet Feare preuailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadours restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, verie soone after, did make voide all Iudgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Achaens vpon any Citizen of Lacedemon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedemon, should be suffered to continue a member of the Achaean Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had beene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achaians, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slavery had the Greekes, and all Kings and Common-wealths whatsoever, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterranean Seas, reduced themselves, by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile and perswasion of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made meere vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so preuaile with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of selfe-maine, brought them from the honour which they enioyed, of being free Princes and Citie, into most bale and fearefull seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoever he should take armes, as shortly he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie soone following. Hee had beene loquaciously vied at Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of obiections, whereto his youth, vnkilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answere: it was permitted vnto him, to reade such briefe mores as hee had receiued from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then said and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the entreatie of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a ieaousie of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadours from Rome; some bringing one commendement; some another; and some requiring him to fulfill those things, which had beene imposed vpon him by their fore-goes. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that he had done things vnwillingly; and would be obedient, no longer than hee needs must. With these Embassadours young Demetrius was contentant: rather perhaps out of simplicitie, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deal more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder son of the King, should not succeede vnto his father, but that the Diademe should be conferred vpon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This he did not onely Perseus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his younger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceede vnto the bitter fruits of this ieaousie, it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

§. II.

The death of Philopemen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Militarie profession is of all other the most vnhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to proue the contrary.

THE Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptoric with the Achaens; that they seemed not vnlikely to take part against them, in any controuersie that should be moued. Hereupon the Messeniens, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achaean Common-wealth, hauing long beene of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, seuered from communion with any other: This was the deuiſe of some that were powerful in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-strongly affected in the businesse; were careful to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achaean League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that blood should bee drawne, and either side so farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Vpon the same of their commotion and proceedings; Philopemen, then Prator of the Achaens, leuied such forces as hee could in haste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achaens, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soone in a readinesse to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; hee had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messeniens; whom hee charged, and forced to battle. But whilst his horsemen were too earnest in following the chace, there arrived, by chance, a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gave new courage vnto those that were fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopemen Horsemen to turne backe. Philopemen himselfe had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him, to be negligent of their safety, which had so willingly aduentured themselves vnder his conduct. Hee tooke vpon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his Horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow line, hee oftentimes about against the Messeniens; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching ouer-neere to him. But it fell out vnhappy, that being cast to ground by a fall of his Horse, and being with all in very weake plight of body, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and took him; yet scarce beleueed their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witness. The first messenger that brought these newsto Messene, was so farre from being beleueed, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ranne forth to meet him, him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theatre, that there they might satisfie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the singular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in deliuering them from Nabis the Tyrant, began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwise, Democrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leave any disgrace, or iniurie, done to him, vnruegenced. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had beene made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heauie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cuppe of poyson, which Philopemen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seuentie yeeres old, and weakened with long sicknesse, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Acheans, when they missed him in their flight, were marvellously offended with themselves, for that they had beene more mindefull to preserve their owne liues, than to looke vnto the sacrifice of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were 20 devising what to doe in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched vnto Messene, craning his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire means would not serue. Lycortas was chosen General of the Armie against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeelde. Then Democrates, knowing what he was expected, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had beene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the althes of Philopemen that were carried home in solemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all of them slaine at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. 30 Q. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. Hee would haue entemedled in this businesse of Messene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the warre against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spightfull enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein vnworthy of the Crowne he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Lauie thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him alieue to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiers were directed to guard and enquire on the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deuised some secret subtilties vnder-ground to saue himselfe from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to saue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, hee tooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwaies preferred for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of aduerser fortune; which being ready to swallow downe, he vttered these words: I will now (said he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath so many yeeres possesse them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius ouer me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall neuer be numbred among the rest of his heroicall decdes: No; it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how farre the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblesse of their forefathers; as, when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italie, and was ready to gree them betraile at their owne dores, they gaue him knowledge of the treason intended against him by pyrrhus.

son; whereas these of a later race haue employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore bene one of their Consuls, so practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith giuen, and contrary to the Lawes of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliuer up his owne Ghost. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortall gods to reuenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poyson, and died.

In this yeere also (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopemen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being all of them, as great Capitaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainly for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we haue now finished, had hee bene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might haue commanded such supplies, as the Warre which he vnderooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home, as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolue it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Countrey and Commonweale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and ieaousie of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more vnprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Capitaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and ieaousie of men, the spoyles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hateful to God, as with 20 good reason did Monluc the Marshall of France confesse, That were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were inuaine for those of his profession to hope for a portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoeuer, this is true, That the victories, which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues haue raised them about the leuell of their inferiours, and haue furnished their enuie: yet haue they bene rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof, as Coriolanus, M. Lainius, 30 L. Amylius, and this our Scipio, whom we haue lately buried. Among the Greekes we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that Dauid bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Ioab. With this fare Alexander feasted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Attius: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was stricken in the world; for there fell of those that fought beside runne-aways, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Attius, hee had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slue Attius) murdered the Emperour, which 40 hee neuer durst attempt, Attius liuing. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Attius, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolued then obscured. The same vnworthy destinie, or farrer worse, had Bellisarius; whose vnder takings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and hee died a blinde begger. Narses also, to the great preiudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Iustine. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath bene well obserued in euery age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed a Turkish one, That euery warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than 50 suffer his owne glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Baiazet the second dispatch Bassa Acomar; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Vissiers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsaluo, who drave the French out of Naples; and Ferdinando Corsete, who conquered Mexico, were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Capitaines of all Nations haue bene paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary, it may be said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places have beene given, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which haue traitorously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vnderstandedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue, is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of the Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, seldome found in any other than cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Heraclius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniuently gotten; and set it on his owne head. Leontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Iusline, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Iusline, hauing recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iusline, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surprised his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for hauing wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlessse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue beene repayed with their owne cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Capitaines to make themselves Kings, haue by Gods iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thriving, by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoile of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vnthankfulnessse in this kinde, hath beene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore and wise man therein, and he deliuered the Citie by his wisdom: but none remembered this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to haue beene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiser sort of them thinke to fauour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes coozened and abused; which proues that weaknesse to be in them: in dedde, whereof they so gladly thinke the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thanks; yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Capitaines haue made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the enemy, they are very inquisitiue to search into it, and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings: yea most iniuriouly to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, haue purloyned somewhat from the common Treasure. Hereof I neede not to produce examples: that of the two Scipios being solatly recited.

In my late Soueraigntie, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie, she was constrained to vndertake, her Maiestie had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martiall men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeeres had; yet, according to the destiny of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admirall excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Maiestie had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witness, who in all her dayes neuer received dishonor, by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by her selfe chosen and employed.

For as all her old Capitaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randol, Drenke, Read, Wyldford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunstable, Beuchier, Barkley, Bingham, and others:

to those of a later and more dangerous employment, whereof Norris and Pere were the most famous, & who haue done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as euer any did: those (I say) with many other braue Colonels, haue left behinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many trauels and wounds) no little estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie L. Wylloughby of Bresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

That her Maiestie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleeue other men than herselfe, a discafe vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, haue bene subiect, I say that such a confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weakenesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actions are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which Martiall men seldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a profession farre more noble than their owne, seeing therein they should only minde their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deserting, and of farre greater vertue than themselves.

But his Maiestie hath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honoured more Martiall men, than all the Kings of England haue done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable seruice, as well in the yere 1588, as in Calizo, the Islands, and in our owne Sea; hauing first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maiestie hath changed the Baronies of Monim and Burley into Earldomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Ruffell, Carew, Danners, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their gouernments and seruices in the Netherland, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§. III.

Philip making provision for warre against the Romans, deales hardly with many of his owne subiects. His negotiation with the Bassarane. His cruelty. Hee suspecteth his sonne Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slaine, by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sonnes death; whom hee findeth to haue bene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

Phileas Martius the Roman Embassador, who travelled vp and downe, seeking what worke might bee found about Greece, had receiued instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedonia. At his returne home, that he might not seeme to haue discovered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoever they enioyned him; yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than mere necessity should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which hee was deuising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnesse to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with safety of their honour, if they could finde conuenient meanes; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparent) by what meanes soeuer. Hee was in an ill case: as hauing bene already vanquished by them, hauing lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; hauing subiects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet he provided as well as hee could desuise, against the necessitie which he daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad seruice against the Romans, he compelled to forsake their dwellings, and remooued them all into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence they were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured against against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, hee devised vpon alluring the Bastarne, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the river of Danubius, to abandon their fear, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardaniens, and take possession of their Country. These were like to do him notable service against the Romans: being not onely stout fighting men; but such as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefit that could bee hoped by their arrival, must be the vetter extirpation of the Dardaniens; a People alwaies troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whensoever they found aduantage. Neither was it iudged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarne, by hope of spoyle, and other incitements, vnto a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peradventure some others, through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of these Bastarne from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardaniens, vpon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious iourney vnto them, that carried with them their wiues and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to passe. And thus hee sought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them; since he was not like to finde assistance from any ciuill Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuises were long ere they rooke effect: so as the Bastarne came not before such time as hee was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the training of his men to Warre, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Towneships, which hee had caused much against their wils to forsake their ancient dwellings, & betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meetest for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within words: hee hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which also hee did unwillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparent. This euill therefore would loone haue bene determined, had not his cruell and vindicative nature made it worse. Hee could not pardon words proceeding from iust sorrow: but imputed all to traitorous malice; and accordingly did seeke reuenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deferredly. This encreased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a most barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom hee had injured, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill hee should haue massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically hee had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragically then perhaps hee could haue desired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, hee felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings younger sonne. It may well bee (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nouerth difference on betwene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardineesse of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreame ialousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparell, or the vnfighly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were inserted in ordinarie discourse and table-talk, Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praying them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conuersation with their Embassadors, as often as they came, gaue his father cause cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuises with his elder sonne Perseus: who fearing so much lest his brother should step betwene him and the succession, converted wholly vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty yeres old; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five yeres, more open and vnswarie in his actions, yet thought olde and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practises, than his free speeches discouered. The ialous head of the King hauing entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder sonne, a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great solemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus: They cleft in twaine a bitch; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailles, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first original, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the King between his two sonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Hauing performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into two parts: which, vnder the Kings two sonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vring poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-earnestly seeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those flakes, vntill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himselfe was sorry for this, as it had beene some bad preface: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vse. They were of the craftier sort: who perceiuing which way the Kings fauour bent, and how all the courtes of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addressed their seruises to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heate of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to obserue what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himselfe so indifferently, that he was taken & well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of dores. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet hee would leaue none of his traine behinde, but forced them all to beare him company. They, fearing to bee ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to preuent all danger. Yet wasthere such good espial kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked vp his dores, as if he stood in feare to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondered to see himselfe excluded, and feared very angrily with his brother. But Perseus bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the younger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alleged, and in effect the same hath bene here recited, saue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had vnderaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to vnderake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans; by whom hee knew that hee should be defended and borne out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because hee bore a due respect vnto his father, and was forrie to see him spoyle, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause hee said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For prooffe hereof hee cited a letter, sent of late from T. Quintus to the King himselfe: whereof the contents were, That hee had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further doe well to send him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honourable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence hee enforced, That this counsell was giuen by Them, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those; that should should wait vpon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become seruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hetero Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembered them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that converted matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him; He said that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wife from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practice, He were more like to lose it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a jealous father, That he would conclude nothing vpon the excessse or error, whatsoeuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better obseruation of their liues, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may seeme to haue dealt both iustly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gaue himself ouer wholly to Perseus: vnto so little conference with his yonger sonne, that when hee had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him present, nor nere vnto him. About all, he had especiall care, to learne out what had passed betwene Demetrius and T. Quintus, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to 20 Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interessed in the quarrells betwene the brethren, though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to bee written by Titus (whose seale they had counterfeited) vnto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices vnusurable, against his elder brother; which yet should neuer take effect, for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if hee had pittied the estate of the vnhappy Prince; and fowring out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discouered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to liue in safety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than hee could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reuerfion vnto the Crowne of Macedon. Whatsoeuer his hopes & meanings were, all came to nought through the fallhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his sonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for fear lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a prooffe sufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accused Minister of his Kings vnadvised sentence, first gaue payson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Heereupon hee sent a couple of Rusticks, to finish the tragedie: who villanously accomplished their work by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not beene found a King, that had thus cruellie dealt with any Prince of his owne bloud. The houses of Lysimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or euen vpon their heeles; by intestine discord and iealousies, so grounded on desire of soueraigne rule, or feare of losing it. By the like vnnatural hatred, had almost bene cut off the lines of Ptoleme and Seleucus: which though narrowlie they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously disordered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that vsitant family of the Kings of Perseus had raised it selfe to marvellous greatnesse, in very short space, from the condition of meere slavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is said to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly hee had reason so to doe: not more more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherisht him in his minoritie. But He was himselfe of an vnmercifull nature; & therefore vnnert to be a good perswader vnto kindly affection. The murders by him done vpon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his bloud-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed vpon many innocents, both strangers, and subiects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poyson. After the death of his sonne, Hetoo late began to examine the crimes that had bene objected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance. Then found he nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not bin contriuer of the whole processe. His onely remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remouee of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no lesse to bee feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his vnwill trouble of minde, and carelesse of making prouision against them. Hee was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betwene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner 20 desolate, some expecting his death; and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deepe melancholy, and filled his head with suspicious imaginations; the like whereof hee had neuer bene flow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed: and so much the more, for that hee knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hateful to Perseus: and thus becoming subiect vnto the same iealous impression which troubled the King, became also prater of his secrets. This counsaillour, when hee found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and giue ease to the King, vntill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philocles and Apelles, (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the businesse: made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, he found one Xebus, a man most likely to haue vnderstood what false dealing was vied by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying, that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to vtter what he knew. Xebus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himselfe, that he had bene employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he vnderstood that by the vnnatural practice of one sonne, he had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous and 40 innocent. Hee raged exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the authors of the mischief. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, Philocles was taken: and either so farre as hee could not denie it when Xebus confronted him, yielded himselfe guilty, or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flye the Countrey: yet not so stout as to adventure himselfe into his fathers presence. Hee kept on the borders of the Kingdome, towards Thrace, whilst his father wintred at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to attaine the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonus. But his weak body, and excessive grieffe of minde, so disabled him in the trauell thereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpose to 50 effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himselfe with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, hee might thanke his own peruerse condition: since his Vncle, King Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it ease for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was iustly punished by feeling the difference betwene the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected; and the the life of a King, whereof he little cared to performe the durie. His death, euen whilst yet he was onely drawing neere, was fore-signified vnto Perseus, by Calligenes the Physician; who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine hee no lesse improuidently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IIII.

How the Bastarna fell vpon Dardania. The behavior of Perseus in the beginning of his reigne. Some warres of the Romans: and how they suffered Masaniissa cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrell with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Achaeans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring vpon him.

IMmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Bastarna into Thrace: where order had been taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrie. This compact was friendly obserued, as long as no other was knowne than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his seruice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all dash and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarna would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers. Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Bastarna had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, receiued by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, fawthirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seemes that by the carelesse vsing of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselves: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their owne Countrey.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his minde to the setting of his Estate: which well done, hee might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for warre or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion, he quickly tooke a way the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; hee saue personally to heare their causes in iudgement (though herein he was fo ouer-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceived this his vertue of iustice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Aboueall, hee had care to auoid all necessitie of warre with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league, which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was hee negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein too excessively bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, hee became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeede the maistring passion, which ouer-ruled so him, and changed him into so many shapcs, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For prooue of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Hisria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrells, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as euer since the victory) a heauy hand: and suffered Masaniissa to take from them what hee

lifted. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romans. Masaniissa therefore had great aduantage over them, and was not ignorant how to vse it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoever he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had hee once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrie of Emporia: and so did he vse them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masaniissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; who afterwarde Syphax wanne from Gala, and within awhile, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wife Sophoniba, and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law: This did Masaniissa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose iudgement the case was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this injury, when Masaniissa came vpon them againe, and tooke from them about seuentie Townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniissa, invading their Countrey, howsoever hee was pleased to call it his: yet since he was confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to beare defenseu armes against him, but suffered themselves to be beaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that either they might haue fairer iustice; or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly giue place to fauor, that the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Masaniissa should be allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them vnderstand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves in honour should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Iudges; than continually to liue in feare, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And here withall the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping in hope to moue compassion.

Here may we behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant house of the Barchines, of their irresolution, in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny worthing, in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they seruants, euen to the seruants of those men, whose fathers they had oft chased, slaine, taken, & sold as bondslaves in the streets of Carthage, & in all Cities of Africa & Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often & so earnestly desired. Onely they want peace with Masaniissa, once their mercinarie, and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might haue beene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battell at Canna; than Hannibal that won it was vied by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, euery man of them, all his priuate riches, vpon the Commonwealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to set out an Armie into Spain, at what time the enemy lay vnder their owne walls. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians hauing fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging vnto the vanquished. Their pittifull behaviour bredde peraduenture some commiseration, yet their teares may seeme to haue beene mistrusted, as proceeding no lesse from enuie vnto the Romans, than from any feeling of their owne calamitie. They thought themselves able to fight with Masaniissa: which estimation of their forces was able to makethem, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leaue as they sought;

of defending their owne right by armes : but contrariwise, when without leave obtained they presumed to farre, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the sonne of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related vnto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadours thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not given him instructions, how to deale in that businesse. Only it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had beleied unskill diuers nights, in the Temple of Aesculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, therto entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romanes and of his Father might not be ouermuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gaue little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoever was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the covenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to enioy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa, bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should doe well to send Embassadours, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when 20 the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romanes were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of vrging them vnseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better vsage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was vnlkely) that they should be vanquished, he made none other account, than that all Africke round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romanes had not been vnmindfull of Persus. They visited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to obserue his behaviour. These he entertained kindly at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Bassarne were thence gone; though he protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done; to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did vnto other some. Where hee did harme to any; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where hee did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, (vpon what occasion it is vn certaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slue Euphranor, whom hee had appointed their gouernour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlkely to haue presumed to farre, vnlesse either they had bene extremely prouoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romanes. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them: Persus did soon assay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romanes took very angrily this presumption of the King: euen as if hee had inuaded some Countrey of their Italian confederates, & not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had hee humbled once his necke, they could themselves haue done the part of Masanissa, though Eumenes, 50 or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league betweene them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greekes; & generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equal termes: whom vnto they rewarded with a frowne, whensoever they presumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwise bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraordinary fauour at Rome caused them them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messenians by warre; T. Quinius rebuked them, as too arrogant, intaking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Scemably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats, when theyooke vpon them to carry any businesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romanes. Who neuerthelesse, vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in vsurping the practice of Armes, which 10 belonged onely to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard lesson, they were such vnto toward Schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Acheans, refused not onely to giue them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a carelesse insolencie, rejected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemy might not be supplied from Italie, with victualls or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argiues, Lacedaemonians, or Corinthians, would revolt from the Acheans; they themselves would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was beleued, that 20 the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not vpheld by countenance of the Romanes. All this notwithstanding; when Lycartas Prator of the Acheans had vnterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Acheans, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romanes with an ill-favoured grace, tell the same Embassadours, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie) That they had strictly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a faigned grauitie, to haue serued their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more 30 suspected; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soueraine power, in directing all matters of Warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make Warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against mere strangers; without interposing the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnlesse peraduenture sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Roman Arts howsoever many (for gainefull or timorous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, hauing neither subiects of their owne that might rebell, nor power where- 40 with to bring any into subiection, for want of more noble argument wherewith to practice their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romanes, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Mitridates: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-craters for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdomes, that with ouer-nice diligence stroue to preserve their libertie and lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to be deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most vnplaine, and wherein many of the Greekes began to haue 50 assistance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow than to breake.

Neither Persus nor the Romanes were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time stood affected. Persus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subiects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, wherinto Greece was likely to bee reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeede they not onely perceived the approaching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves themselves grieved with the present subjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to chooſe among themſelves none other Magiſtrates, than ſuch as affected the good of their Countrey, and would for no ambition, or other ſeruiſe reſpect, bee flatterers of the greateſt which kept all in feare. Thus it ſeemed likely, that all domeſtick conſpiracies would ſoone be at an end, when honeſtie and loue of the Common weale, became the faireſt way to preferment. Of this carefull promiſion for the ſafety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly aduerted: eyther becauſe things were diligently concealed from their Embaſſadours, whom all men knew to bee little better than Spies; or becauſe little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by ſuch Traytors (of whom euery Citie in Greece had too many) as were men vt regarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to ſpeake maliciously than truly; or perhaps becauſe the Embaſſadours themſelves, being all Senators, and capable of the greateſt Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, then was fitting to their owne deſires of employment. But it was hard to conſeale that which many know, from theſe that are feared or flattered by many. The Acheans being to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, that ſhould both excuſe them, as touching ſome point wherein they reſuſed to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the ſame buſineſſe: choſe one Calliſtates, among others, to go in that Embaſſage. By their making choiſe of ſuch a man; one may perceiue the aduantage, which miſchievous wretches, who commonly are forward in purſuing their vile deſires, haue againſt the plaine ſort of honeſt men; that leaſt eaſtly thruſt themſelves into the troubleſome buſineſſe of the weale publike. For this Calliſtates was in ſuch wiſe transported with ambition; that he choſe much rather to betray his Countrey, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himſelfe therein. Wherefore in ſtead of well diſcharging his credence; and alleading what was meeteſt in iuſtification of his people: he ventred a quite contrary tale; and ſtrongly encouraged the Romans, to oppreſſe both the Acheans and all the reſt of Greece, with a ſarre more heauy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the ſetting of their authority, among his froward Countreymen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a cuſtome, to ſtand vpon points of confederacie; and lawes: as if theſe were principally to bee regarded; any inuention from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Acheans both now, and at other times, did what beſt pleaſed themſelves, and answered the Romans with excuſes: as if it were enough to ſay, That by ſome condition of League, or by force of ſome Law, they were diſcharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be ſo, if hee, and ſome other of his opinion, might haue their wills: who ceaſed not to affirme, That no Columes or Monument erected, nor no ſolemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obſeruance of Confederacie or ſtatute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themſelves, That the multitude reſuſed to giue care vnto ſuch perſwaſions. For howſoeuer in popular Eſtates, the ſound of libertie vſed to be more pleaſable, than any diſcourſe tending againſt it: yet if they which vnderooke the maintenance of an argument, ſeeming neuer ſo bad, were ſure by their fo doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increaſe apace, & they became the preuaient faction. It was therefore ſtrange how the Fathers could ſo neglect the aduancement of thoſe, that ſought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiesty. More wiſely, though with ſeditious and rebellious purpoſe, did the Greekes: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwiſe of little account or deſert, only for hauing vttered ſome braue words againſt the Romans. The Fathers hearing theſe and the like reaſons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughlie thoſe that were obſtinate, and by cheriſhing their friends, to make their partie ſtrong; reſoluſed to follow this good counſaile, in euery point; yea to depreſſe all thoſe that held with the right, and to ſer vp their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more preſumptuouſly with the Acheans, then had bene their manner in former times; but wrote at the preſent vnto all Citieſ of Greece; requiring them to ſee that their mandate (which was concerning the reſtitution of thoſe that were baniſhed out of Lacedaemon) ſhould be fulfilled. Particularly in behaile of Calliſtates; they aduiſed all men, to beſich, and ſo affected, as hee was, in their ſeueral common-weales. With this diſpatch, Calliſtates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Countrey into the way of ruine, but himſelfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheleſſe hee forbore to vant himſelfe, of his eloquence vſed in the Senate. Onely hee fo reported his Embaſſage, that all men became fearefull of the danger; wherewith hee threatned thoſe that ſhould preſume to oppoſe the Romans. By ſuch arts he obtained to be made Pretor of the Acheans: in which Magiſtracie, as in all his courſes following, hee omitted nothing, that might ſerue to manifeſt his ready obſequiouſneſſe vnto thoſe whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatening termes wonne many flatterers, and loſt as many true friends: ſo Perſeus on the other ſide, thinking by liberal gifts, and hopeful promiſes, to aſſure vnto himſelfe thoſe that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honeſter than his enemies had. Thus were all the Citieſ of Greece diſtracted with factions: ſome holding with the Romans; ſome with the Macedonian; and ſome few, reſpecting onely the good of the Eſtates, wherein they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not ſufferable, That a King, no better than their vaſſall, ſhould dare to become head of a faction againſt them. This therefore muſt be reckoned in the number of his treſpaſſes: wherof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, ſhall afford them iuſt occaſion to make warre vpon him. Perſeus hauing finiſhed his buſineſſe among the Dolopians, made a iourney to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his Arme along with him; yet went, and returned in ſuch peaceable and friendly wiſe, that no place was the worſe for his iourney, but the good affection towards him generally increaſed thereby. With theſe that were in his way, he dealt himſelfe; to ſuch as lay further off, he ſent Embaſſadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatſoeuer, done by his father, might be buried with his father; ſince his owne meaning was to hold friendſhip ſincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could haue bene pleaſed better, if hee had behaued himſelfe after a contrary faſhion, and done ſome acts of hoſtilitie in his paſſage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken ſuch a iourney, without their licence; this alſo was made a valuable matter, and caſt into the heape of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the ſoule of the Acheans: which his father had loſt; that by a ſolemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was iealouſie perhaps, no leſſe than hatred, which cauſed them, at the firſt, to make ſuch a decree. For howſoeuer Philip had by manie vile acts, eſpecially by the death of the two Aradii, giuen them cauſe to abhorre him: yet in the publike adminiſtration of their eſtate, he had, for the more part, bene to them ſo beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall conſent, they reſoluſed to forſake him. Wherefore it was needfull, euen for preferation of concord among them, to vſe all circumſpection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiats, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him ſo doubtfully affected: eſpecially when by hearkening to his meſſages, they might make themſelves ſuſpected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of Wayre, and when all danger of innouation was paſt; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as noſtthing deadly hated, without leauing means of reconciliation. And hereof the Acheans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like ſort, forbidden the Kingdom of Macedon: yet vnderſtanding what would be due to them, if they ſhould adventure thither, none of them durſt ſet foot therein. Hence it came to paſſe, that their bondmen, knowing a ſafe harbour, out of which their maſters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the loſſe of ſuch, as made of their ſlaues very profitable vſe. But Perſeus tooke hold vpon this occaſion: as ſitly ſeruing to pacifie thoſe, whoſe enmitie ſaine he would haue changed into loue. Hee therefore apprehended all theſe fugitiues, to ſend them home againe: and wrote vnto the Acheans, That as for good will vnto them, hee had taken paines to reſtore back their ſeruants; ſo ſhould they do very well to take order for keeping them, th: hereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily vnderſtood, & his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearſed by the Pretor, before the Councell. But Calliſtates took the matter very angrily; and bade them be aduiſed what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine deuice, to make them depart from the friendſhip of the Romans. Heerewithall hee tooke vpon him, ſomewhat liberally, to make the Acheans before-hand acquainted with the Warre, that was coming vpon Perſeus from Rome. Hee told told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly Heere heard all those matters, which were afterwards alleged by the Romans; the invasion of the Bastarne, vpon the Dardaniens; the Kings iourney against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behaviour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the event of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Heere too good answer was made by the Prators brother: That Calliocrates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renewed his league with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that Hee had louingly entertained their Embassadors. This beeing so: why might not the Achaens, as well as the Atolians, Thessalians, Epirians, and all the Greekes, hold with him (such correspondence, as common humanity required? Neuertheless Calliocrates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-stiffly gainsay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answer made the whilest, That since the King had onely sent a letter without an Embassadour; they knew not how to resolue. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and conuenient. But when Perseus, herewith not contented, would needes vige them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to giue audience: which was prooffe sufficient (to one that could vnderstand) of the condition wherein they liued. For harkening to this aduice of Calliocrates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassadour: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonians; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

S. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodiens and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and condemnes his enemies the Rhodiens; with the causes thereof. The vnusuall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt vpon Eumenes. The brotherly love betwene Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his deuice to poison some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the iustice of this warre.

E*umenes* King of Pergamus had bene troubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom hee was animated with comfortable words, and promise. That they, by their authority, would end the businesse, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselfe; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this being at good leisure; he began to consider, how the affaires of Macedonia stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore hee was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonians; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigall in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to waxe euery where stale: whilest Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despite of this indignitie, Hee stirred vp the Zycians against the Rhodiens his old friends: and in helping the rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore & indirect courses of reuenge. The Zycians could not bee saued by his patronage, from seuerer and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodiens. This rendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hateful to the which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a Decree of the Achaens, as too vniuersally misbecoming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he needed not to haue regarded, had hee not bene too vainly ambitious) befell him, especially for his being ouer-seruiceable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell, the libertie of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse hereof; hee thought it in vaine to strive any longer with bounty, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therefore hee resolved euery to ouerturne the foundations of this popularity, by inducing the Romans vnto to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes, and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the Kingdome, as he had bene rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end hee made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarne into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermeddling in businesse of neighbours; his riches, and his great prouisions: were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Onely he defended into particulars, hauing searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, That Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse, of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine tenthousand Mercenaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great. The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Soldiours as many as hee should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driuen; either to liue vpon spoyle, or to take from his owne Subiects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus the sonne and successour of Antiochus the Great, had giuen his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus; and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassadors from all quarters. Neither spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loth to vtter it plainly) That euery the enuie of their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied, or iustified (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans; & that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedonia, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to fore-warne them; since it would be to Himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to beleuee that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus; lest hee should set vpon them in Italie. Neuertheless so far as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were giuen to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so that Hee told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadors, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitie against them; their iniustice, and oppression, would haue bene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and securitie? Toward this iustificacion of the warre, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto; their more then vniuersall consensie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his end was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadours were at Rome, prouided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speake; and with matter of reprimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to haue disclosed all: when the warinesse of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearefull apprehension; against which, it behoued their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore carelesse audience was giuen to the Rhodian Embassadours; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublefome to Asia, than Antiochus had euer beene, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conueighed by Sea vnto Perseus, his bride Laodice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifullly required, so the Romans despihtfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were setting themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassidours came from Rome with strange newes, which gaue new life to the rebellion: For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as meeke vassals, but as dependants and associates. For prooffe hereof, they referred themselves vnto the commentaries of the tenne Embassadours, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victory against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masinissa, The Atolians, and all other Kings or Estats, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subiects, had cause to zo finde themselves agrieved if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subiects might easily be made their fellows, wheneouer it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was onely to plague the Rhodians, for their good will to Perseus, by letting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could there fore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadours; which indeed more neerely touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his loue to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelesly as angrily: though perad-³⁰ uenture it well contented them to finde cause of anger. For whereas at other times all cares had beene taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to giue them satisfaction, concerning any deede or word of his, that might fauour of hostility; but that, if his trouble in this kinde piousd vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often fals out contrary to expectation. These bigge words may seeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embassadours; rather than from instruction giuen by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet were there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at⁴⁰ this time, thinke to speede better by a shew of daring, than he was like to doe by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliuerance from the Roman seruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps vterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which theron depended, by discovering his too much weakenesse of spirit, vnanswerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subiect (in appearance) to Fortune, which might haue bene his, had he knowne how to vie it.

Now that this brauery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heart; it appears by his daring to aduenture soone after, on a practice that more iustly might anger the Romans, and giue them fairer shew of reason to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, inturning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure stout ruffians to doe the murder: who placing themselves behinde a broken mud wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence assault the King; whom they sorely builed with great stones, and left for dead. They might haue finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flie in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discouer them. Eumenes was conueighed away to the little Ile of Agina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as King, and either tooke or would haue taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonice the daughter of King Antiochus, whom he then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue; That when the King returned aliue home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, received none other checke, than, that Hee should forbear to marrie with the Queen, until Hee were tell assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall fauour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to haue transferred the Kingdome from his brother to him. By such concord of brethren, was the Kingdome of Pergamus raised and vpheld: as might also that of Macedon haue bene, if Demetrius had liued and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad when he vnderstood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saved all from discouerie. But as he was deceived in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes liued: so was Hee beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For Hee had written to one Praxe a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he sent about this businesse: and in, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassadour then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundisium: who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaded with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassadour, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundisium was the ordinary Port, for ships passing betwene Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gaue entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadours, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, iourning to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitalitie, he was commended to Perseus, and invited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courties to his Embassadours, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiarity than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings secrets. The summe of all was, That he must needes doe a turne, in giuing to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare qualitie; sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should be tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at libertie; he discouered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had neuer scene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellows affirmation, the acclamation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe, and in like sort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to haue had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall protesting, That such objections were not to be made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulnessse of making warre vpon him; but rather vnto a subiect pleading for his life in iudgement. But howsoeuer the Romans neglected the getting of stronger prooffe (which might haue bene easie) than any that wee finde by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very fiteable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such priuate offences, it gaue him no priuiledge: they iudging him to haue offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not send men, to waste the Kingdome of Pergamus, or to besiege the Townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe it by poison? Wherefore they presently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it vnto him, vnlesse he would yeelde to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to haue bene so confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his enemies more calme. Hee caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long bene collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that Hee had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samos with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue stood vpon the euidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, well-beloued, and well friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Insolent, and vnderminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better then meere spies. Finally, he promised to giue them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league, made betwene them and his father, and renewed by himselfe indeede onely for feare: but wished them to defend to more equal conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would aduise, as they might also doe for theirs.

Polyb. Legat. 9 In the forme of the league betwene Philip and the Romans, as it is set downe by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Liuie inserts a clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden, to make any war abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had bene restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which so neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would vige this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive armes, without their permission: then had Perseus very iust reason to finde himselfe aggriued. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whilest they themselves were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as vnjust; he ministred occasion vnto the Embassadors, to giue him defiance. 40 Having heard the worst of their message, he commanded them to be gone out of his kingdom in three dayes. But either he should haue bene lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serue him to vndertake the warre; he should courageously haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediately, whilest the Enemy was vnprepared: not haue lost opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

S. VI.

The Romans sollicit the Greekes, to ioyne with them in the Warre against Perseus. How the Greekes stood affected in this warre. The timorositie of Perseus. Matius a Roman Embassador deludes him with hope of Peace. His forces. He takes the field, and mines part of Thessalie. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what assistants the Romans had in this warre. Of Tempe in Thessalie; and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might haue had: but lost by his feare. Perseus braues the Romans; fights with them, knowes not how to vse his victorie; sues for Peace: and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus hauing the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Beotians rebell against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the warre against Perseus. They vex the Greekes their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes provision, hauing heard their complaints. The flattering Alabandors.

SO long had the Romans bene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian war, that well might they haue bene ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of mixing their cause honestly in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleue, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others, whomust afterwards dearly pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeede any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the distinction betwene their seuerall Estates; howsoeuer the generalitie of them were inclined the same way. Neuerthelesse Embassadors were sent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in waies pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors vsed as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied: "But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtesie: and vnderstood, that not only such as made refusall, but euen they who might seeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly, were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans: the Acheans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them; being rather 40 doubtfull, euen when they had done their best, lest it should be allaken; as if they had halted in some part of their duetie. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to see vp the side, whereof they gladly would haue scene the ruine. The vulgar sort was euenly where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Romans; they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though Hee * iudged the victory of Perseus, like to proue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his en- 77 deuours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperiall Citie, made the Acheans and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demanour of Perseus himselfe. He had vnderaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not onely to his owne Kingdom, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him; than he began to speake the enemie faire, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euery small thing would serue to terrifie him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by by giuing him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take reuenge at leisure vpon those which had assisted him: little cause was there, why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeede a great noise, leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few Townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadours. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadours, and a man of more finenesse in cunning than was vsuall among the Romans; made shew of inclination to the King desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King inuited, and obtained a meeting at the Riuer Penus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadours, and especially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith fauished; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conueniently be done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might haue done much, ere the Roman Armie could haue bene in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; hee suffered a most conuenient season, of winning vpon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bene with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation betwixt him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadours also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superior in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the difference betwixt him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnesse of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helpees. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honour, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the utmost of his ambition. This his scarcenesse might seeme excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly their owne: had it not bin his office, who took vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a manly beginning to the warre, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him; and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to doe against the good liking of the Romans. The Bevians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a sort, they yielded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall forme; but caused their severall Townes to make couenant apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common-weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebel) haue such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This worke, of separating the Bevians from Thebes their head; was more than Agesilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedaemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedaemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the King sat still, as being bound by the truce: and hauing done this, he returned to the Citie, where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reprooued it as dishonestly) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadours which Perseus had sent; audience was giuen to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serue their turne, the Senate being reioiced before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirty daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the wals, in the Temple of Bellona (the vsuall place of giuing audience to open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the short warning of cleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtesie serue onely to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely meane, both to keepe a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee should neede it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soone, as the Macedonian Embassadours were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to haue roused Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was he contented to deliberate awhile, Whether it were better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeeme their good will with some part of his Kingdome, that so he might enioy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsel preuailed; which also was the wisest, and so would haue proued, had it bene stoutly and wisely followed. He now beganne, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should haue bin done long afore. Hee caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendenous at Cittium, a Towne in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Cittium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse: whereof about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with liuely speeches, laying before them, the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the godnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his provisions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their severall abilities. He gaue them thanks: but answered, That his owne provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them onely to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Countrey, in their iourney towards him. Some Townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wonne by force. Of these last was Myle; a Towne thought impregnable, and therefore not more stoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a fallie; which the Townsmen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of warre was practised here: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Relatie and Conanus (townes of much importance, especially Conanus, which stood in the streights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Hauing well fortified this passage, the King marched on wards to Sycorium, a Towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him onely two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the severall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masaniissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young sonne, there to be brought vp: yet he did little or nothing in this warre, perhaps because Eumenes himselfe beganne within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had bene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolemie (though Ptolemie was then young, and vnder Tutors) had businesse of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonians;

yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie trick, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, serued him, for this his counterfet good will. This king had foure and fiftie ships, riding in the hauen of Dyrrachium, vnccertain to what purpose: all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind fort, making shew to beleue, That for none other end then to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoeuer Gentius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his kingdome and himselfe, in the end of this warre; by offering, rather then giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what hee brought ouer the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painefull iourney, through the mountainous Countrey of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had bene ready, attending to his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great ouerthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the Countrey. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing bene freed by them from a more heauie yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poesie) with their Spurtes or branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And as way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vnlesse they would make an hungrie iourney, thorow the countrey of the Dassareians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might haue had, if by mispending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse, yea to winne vpon them (for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done farre greater things, had he seized vpon the streights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the Countrey behinde the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans haue either trauelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to be found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needfull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if hee would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses⁴⁰ they once demed, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Aetolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspition with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Boeotians, how politickly soeuer Martius had wrought with them, aduertured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrell: what would they haue done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Ilyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after awhile began to wauer, when they saw⁵⁰ things goe better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginnings and encreased the number of his well-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as he might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage ouer Greece, & to render the liberty, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this war, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue bene expected expected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a fearfull companie running from their enemies, till some riuer stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to auoid the danger of that warre, whereof he should haue sought the honour, he left his friends that would haue stood by him, and gaue them cause to provide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessity, he chose rather to set his backe to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces; than to be driuen into such milerie, as was ineuitable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessalie, is so hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his trenches and lay still encamped by the Riuer of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which, if he would the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore he incited the Romans into the field; by wasting the land of the Phereans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduerture euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victory his owne. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Capitaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, awhile together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldness much increased; and much more his reputation: to the griefe of those who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The Towne of Sycyrium, where Perseus then lay, was twelues miles from the Romans: neither was there any conuenient watering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but hee was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconueniences, he found out a lodging, seauen miles neerer to the enemy: whom hee visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His coming at such an vnusuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore hee sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Capitaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature to trie their fortune: hee himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retreat) with little losse of his owne. But hee discovered his weakenesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assaile their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Capitaines, though vnfit for: he neuertheless tooke it for sound aduice, which indeede was timorous and base. To worke warily, and moderate his victory; by which meanes it was said, that either he should geue honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it bene greater, and had hee wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue bene the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euen when he had the victory, what else did hee, than proclaime vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twentie horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heauinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remoue to a furer place beyond the Riuer Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud teermes, to draw vpon himselfe a greater calamitie. So hee passed the Riuer in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Asolians were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greekes followed them. Five of them, that were men of especiall marke, had bene obserued to be the first which turned their backs: an obseruation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shunne indignation, or incurre fauour, then must they adventure no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne libertie. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, he not vntill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safetie; which they could neuer haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or giuen better heede to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to haue routed them whilst they were conuoying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue bene done, since there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prætors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoiles of them without resistance, as yielding themselves ouercome. With such braue words did the King set out the glory of his action; diuiding the spoiles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor found. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way betwene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neuerthelesse he was easily persuaded to the occasion, which he seemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore he went vnto the Consul, and offered to yield vnto the same Conditions, wherein his Father had bene bound to the Romans; if the warre might so take end. It were needefull here againe to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a truce, whilst Embassadours might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommoditie redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; saue that Perseus would yeeld both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius, to be so resolute in aduersitie. On the other side, it argued a faint heart in Perseus, that hauing received an answer so peremptory, he still persisted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himselfe backe to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Misagenes the sonne of Maianissa, with the aide before mentioned. This distance betwene the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their haruest: about which businesse they ranged all ouer the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which he attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to haue fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the forragers; he had a good hand vpon them, if he could haue withdrawn it, and giuen out in time. But whilst he strooue to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was ouercome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was; whereby what losse he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, saue onely Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

it, and so to haue gotten corraunce into Tempe. But finding the worke too hard, he returned backe vnto the Perrhians and others; from whom he won some townes; & among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme not to haue belonged vnto the Thessalians; vntlesse, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater Acts than we finde recorded; and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embassadour could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman Armie, then on foot in Greece; and a Naue on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other pæric Townes, which by that same distraction of the Bœotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had bene. The causes hereof were to haue bene sought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lucerius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoyling them, that hee would haue brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreame oppression he could haue driven them to faue. Neither was Licinius the Consul vndiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in general; That in the warre which hee made, hee cruelly and couetously demeaned himselfe.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hestilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hestilius shewed more of his indastrie, in picking quarrels with the confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the warre against the Macedonians. For concerning the Roman warre vpon his Kingdome, after that the Consul had fought a passage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled in dede on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Armie of 30 thousand, and who, by leaues made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his Armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Viciana, a border Towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; sallied forth vpon him, ouerthrew him, and chased him so farre, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this Towne of Viciana shortly after became Roman: which how soeuer it happened, Perseus very soone recooned it, and many other places therewithall: Cotrys, a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, reuolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painefull iourney into Ætolia: where he was promised to be admitted into Siratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Aperantia; and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe thoroughly beaten by Cleus, one of his Lieutenants. Such successe had the Macedonian warre vnder Hestilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadours travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and maine to aduance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopemen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achaean horde, but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue bene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as obtained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no color of truth could be found, that might giue countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Asolians: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councell that approved the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garriſons beſtowed in their Townes. But neither the one nor the other of theſe propoſitions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accuſed not onely ſuch as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but alſo the good Patriotes; making it no leſſe than a matter of treaſon, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary ſide, there wanted not ſome, who roundly told theſe pick-thanks of their baſe flattery; rating them openly in ſuch fort, that one of them hardly eſcaped being ſtoned, even in preſence of the Embaſſadours. Thus was all full of accuſations and excuſes: among which the Embaſſadors carried themſelves, as men that could beleue none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The beſt was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and publiſhed, to this effect: That it ſhould be free for all men, to reſuſe obedience to any Roman Magiſtrate, im-¹⁰poſing any burthen for the preſent warre, vnleſſe it were ſuch, as the Senate had likewiſe thought meete. Of this decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or ſeemed, a good remedy of many inconueniences. But they that ſtanding on priuiledge hereof, reſuſed to fill euery commandement, were numbred among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worſe, than to haue bene Traytours. The Senate was driuen to ſet downe this order, by reaſon of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magiſtrates, and eſpecially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Horatius. Lucretius was condemned in a great ſum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans; in that they lo-²⁰ued not to haue their ſubiect oppreſſed. Hortenſius being ſtill in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embaſſages that came to Rome about this time, either to ſeek redreſſe of iniuries, or to offer their ſeruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a Towne of the leſſer Aſia, there was preſented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a moſt baſe piece of flattery. Theſe Alabanders brought three hundred horſemens targets, and a crowne of gold, to beſtow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a deſire to gratifie the Romans with ſome exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would be ſingular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they build a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniuſſary games to be celebra-³⁰ted among them, in honour of that goddeſſe. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptoleme, and the like vaine men, that would be thought gods; or at the ſhamleſſe flattery of ſuch as beſtowed vpon men, and not the moſt vertuous of men, diuine honors; when hee ſees a Towne of houſes, wherein powerfull men dwell, worſhipped as a goddeſſe, and receiued (without ſcorne of the giuers, or ſhame of the preſent) the title of Deiſie, at the gift of ſuch a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

Q. Martius the Roman Conſul, with extreme difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perſeus in abandoning Tempe. The ſonne of Diuſi quitted by Martius; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill ſucceſſe. Their affaires in hard eſtate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius ſent Embaſſadour to Martius from the Achæans. Polybius his honeſt wiſdome beneficiall to the Achæans. King Eumenes grows auerſe from the Romans. Perſeus negotiates with Antiochus and Eumenes. His falſe dealing with Gentius King of Illyria, whom he drawes into the Roman warre. He ſends Embaſſadors to the Rhodians; who vainly take vpon them to be arbitrators betwene him and the Romans. Perſeus loſeth a mightie ſuccour of the Baſtarnæ, by his wretched paſſion.

AFTER two yeeres of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had bene thought likely to reforme all thoſe Countries, and bring them to what paſſe the Romans deſired; as it did in the end. Perſeus had hitherto the better, and was ſtronger now, than when he liued in peace. Hee had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian ſide; his friends, in all parts of Greece, tooke courage daily; and his reputation grew ſuch, as cauſed thoſe that were before wholly Roman, ſo ſuſpect what the iſſue of the warre might proue, and thereupon to be-⁵⁰come wife for themſelves. Contrariwiſe, Licinius and Hoſtilius the Conſuls, had one after the

the other ſpent their time in vaine, ſeeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conqueſt, by very many loſſes received. The Romane Admirals had ſo demeneed themſelves, that many Townes, euen of the beſt affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Romans ſide; and the Armie much leſſened, not onely by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elſe of the Conſull himſelfe (for they laid the blame one vpon the other) in licencing the ſouldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Conſul, who ſucceeded vnto Hoſtilius, was to amend all this: which neuertheleſſe was more then he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a ſtrong ſupply of men. Hee began hotly to ſet the warre on foot, which a long time had ſlept. And hee began the right way: not ſeeking to force the ſtreights that were ſurely guarded, but taking paines to cline the mountaines which were thought able to forbid all paſſage ouer them, without helpe or need of any cuſtodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vn certaine what way hee meant to take, diſtributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permiſſent. But the Conſul proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be diſcouered by the Enemy; or to breake through all oppoſition, or at leaſt wiſe, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they ſhould haue that lay to ſtop him, and at length; if all failed to make a ſafe retreat. He ſent before him foure thouſand of his moſt expedient foot, to diſcouer the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in ouercoming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had fight of the Enemy, that lay to denie their paſſage. They occupied therefore a ſafe peece of ground; and ſent becke word to the Conſul, where they were; intreating him to haſten vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit diſmayed at his arriual, but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their owne Camp at night, with little loſſe on either ſide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue ſcarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the reſt were beholders. In this caſe, it was impoſſible to get forwards: yet a ſhame to returne. Wherefore Martius took the onely courſe remaining; and indeed the beſt: Part of his men hee left with Popilius, to attend ³⁰ vpon the Macedonians: whileſt hee, with the reſt, ſeitch a compaſſe about, and fought out wayes that neuer had bene troden. Herein hee found extreame difficultie: which notwithstanding hee ouercame. Beſides the troubles commonly incident to ſuch journeyes, through places vnfit for habitation: hee was compelled, by labour of hand, to make paths where none were, yea where Nature might ſeeme to haue intended, that none ſhould be. So ſteepe he found the deſcent of the mountaines, in this way which he tooke: that of ſuen miles, which they trauelled the firſt day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themſelves downe; as not daring to truſt their feet. Neither was this the worſt. For they met with rocks, that ſtood one ouer another, ſo vpright, and cumberſome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddy proſpect, and caſting their gouernours, made a terrible noyſe, which affrighted the horſes, and bredde great confuſion. Hauing therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grieuous journey: there was nothing more deſired by the ſouldiers, than that they might be ſuffered to creep backe againe, the ſame way which they had come. But ſhift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kind of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: where- of the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliſſe; the other ſuſtained by two long poſtes, ſtained in the ground below. Vpon theſe two poſtes, or poles, which indeede (not being very ſtrong, ſince it was intended that they ſhould be either cut or broken) were ſtained two rafters, anſwerable in length to the diſtance, betwene the higher and the lower fall: ſo as the end of one bridge might reach vnto the beginning of another. ⁵⁰ Theſe were couered with plincks and turfe; that they might ſeeme continent with the ground; ſo to make the beaſts aduenturous to goe vpon them. If there were a plaine of any good extent from the foot of a rocke, to the next downefall, then might the bridge be ſhorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, vpon one of theſe; the poſts vpholding the frame were cut aſunder; thereby cauſing him to ſinke downe vnto the next bridge; whence he was conueyed in like manner, to the third, and onward ſtill to the verie bottoome. Thus went they downe ſliding, ſome on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an euen valley. By this it appeares, how thoroughly prouided the Romans vſed to be in their journeyes, of things needfull in all occaſions: as alſo what inef-

inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conueyance of themselves and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested; staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, should haue ouertaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and let vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies journeyes were like vnto the first: saue that custom, and the nearenesse to their waies end without meeting enemie, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans coming towards him: since they fought with him vpon the passage, three daies together; he lying so nigh, that he might well haue heard the noyse. Yet was he so possessed with feare; that he neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, fate hearkening after the event. Four-¹⁰ eonly passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were unable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seeke any other way, must bee saue to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, saue through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the foote of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the riuer Helicon becoming there a lake, and called Baphy-²⁰ ras,ooke vp the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily haue bene fortified. Besides all this, there was in the middle of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe; where the spurs of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neere to the wet banks of Peneus, a goodly and deepe riuer which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had bene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome iourney: if Perseus could haue seene his owne advantages. For the Romane Ar-³⁰ mie was not onely in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable trauell: but must needs haue either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the same way that it came, if the King had made good the sight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemes a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemy from about their heads, would haue beaten vpon them, being now aware of the path which they had taken, though hee knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their iourney into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that kingdom had often bene invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were arriued, there was no meanes to escape, without enforcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. For hee no sooner heard that the Enemie was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; then hee fared like one out of his wittes; saying, That hee was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Heerewithall he began to take out of Dium, what hee could carry a-⁴⁰ way in haste; and straight wayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, hee sent a trait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though soone after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Di-⁵⁰ uers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so hee prevented the damage. Whether Niceas, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their seruice was this. Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hasty direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the Sea by their diuing, were payd their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are priuie to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would haue gone surely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleue him to be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacite. Hee thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Alepiodatus, from defence of the passages, where-¹⁰ to they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; saying, that they had betrayed vn- to the Enemie the gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

¹⁰ The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquish- ed his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Ar- mie, this notwithstanding was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance, and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing travelled about a daies iourney, and gotten one towne that yielded, hee was compelled by mere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Thessalie. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the warre: but hauing left behinde, at Magnefia, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had bene careful to occupy one of the Ca-²⁰ stles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might come be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this come, which was most desiriously expected; hee forooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish iour- ney (if not worse then foolish) hee lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bene worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had bene madnesse to put himselfe on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided; as that without enforcement, or sight of the Enemie, hee should besaine to quite it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a badde man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behooued him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe; ³⁰ vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore meanes as haue been shew- ed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the towne of Dium, which hee hastily repaired, finding it dis- mantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the riuer of Enipeus: meaning thereto stop the Enemies proceed- ing all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vfed, would haue bene enough, not onely to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the warre vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For lit-⁴⁰ tle or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continu-⁴⁰ ance of his office. Onely the towne of Heraclea, standing on the riuer of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could; and was not giuen vp for feare. After this Martius did let a bold face towards Dium; as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the King further off: although his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to provide for his wintering. Hee sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the Sea-Townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assailed: but in vaine. The fildes about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times aduentured forth of the Towne; were still put to the worse. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in coming nere ⁵⁰ it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting saile from thence, ran along by Enia, and Antigonea, (landing neere to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) vntill he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes ioyned with him, bringing twenty shippes of Warre: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this access of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the banke. By this occasion, it was learned, that these were arches in the towne-wall filled vp with that earth, and covered with one single row of bricke. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by fapping the walls. To this worke he appointed such as he thought meetest: giving an alarme to the other side of the Towne, thereby to shadow his attempt, the breach was soon made. But whilst the Romanes were shewing for ioy, and ordering themselves for the assault: the Capitaines within the towne perceived what was done; and falyng forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were betwene the ditch and the wall, of whom they slew about fixe hundred, and suffered few to escape vnwounded. This disaster, and the want of good successe on that part of the towne which King Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entering the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. 10

Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meete to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: wherinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Capitaine, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not onely sufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle, or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibus; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without worke) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terror of his appearing suddenly ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dilodge in all haste, setting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprises; euer since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelessly) most vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, then is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians by Agessipolis their Embassadour, who came to him at Heraclea about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seek to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet since he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeit. And so were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him; not onely for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, and of Genius the Illyrian, did set out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good flecte, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wherein he had lately slaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated: though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his armie. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so vnable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new armie be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had bin taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had beene driven from some of the Townes which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himselfe like a man of warre: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdom, he dealt as a craftie master, with a restless working diligence. This indeede neither proued his sufficiency, nor commended his honestie: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheless, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or such delight as weak and busie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Countrey. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hoitinius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessalie; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Achaens, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romanes, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperity they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed: That the Achaens should send their whole power into Thessalie; and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Armie was leued, and Polybius, poly. Legat. with others, sent Embassadours vnto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busie in finding passage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Armie; and awaited the Consuls leisure till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time convenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the seruice of his Nation, wherein soeuer it should be commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but said, that he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behinde in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achaens, fixe thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in fildes, he might doe notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide, and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Achaens be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius, musing and vnable to resolve whether it were for loue to the Achaens, that the Consul was so earnest in this businesse; or rather for enuie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell touching this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incur the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was giuen him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius vttered to him in priuate, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleging that he had no need: In this case therefore, hee had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, vnlesse by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Achaens were fauours, of more then an hundred and twenty talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countreys behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romanes with many a long yeares imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in feare lest the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerway all other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, haue not precisely affirmed any certainty. One reports it, that Eumenes did not so much as giue any helpe to Martius; but comming to haue ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as hee did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking, and thereupon returned home in such anger, that hee refused to leaue behinde him certaine horse of the Gallies, being requested to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romanes good seruice: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the Ioue to Attalus. But it is more generally receiued, that Eumenes gaue a willing eare to Perseus his desire of accord, for meere desire of gaine. And it might well be, that couetousnesse drew him on, in the course, wherinto indignation first led him. Howsoeuer it befall; Perseus caused Eumenes to be founded, and found him so tractable, that hee was bold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertisements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betwene a King and a free Citie: That the Romanes had quarrell alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vsed the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip; and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, assailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Heere with he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort hee admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him giue ouer, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, hee requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should giue answer, he began to offer a bargain of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, then Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his own part, that if he might haue fiftene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I find not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend vnto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receive the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes onely. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samothrace; whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded & ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no neerer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deferred somewhat, howeouer the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needes he would haue part of his wages in present. Thus the two Kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not stirre. Heereunto Perseus loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would seme at the last cast, to deliuer him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten with-³⁰ in Tempe, then did his feare vige him to prodigalitie; so as hee agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus; to the end that all his Armie might haue comfort, by such access of strength to their partie. Presently vpon the bargain made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians to take vpon them, as arbitrators, betweene Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace, wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Romane Senate, hearing proud words to the⁴⁰ same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors; gaue an answer as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vaine glory of the Rhodians was thoroughly chastised; and more thoroughly so should haue bene, if their submission had not been as humble, as their follie was proud. Such vse of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now faine he would haue hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Embassador, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the Warre by land and sea, whilst the Romans were vnprouided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Heereupon tenne Talents were sent to Pantauchus; who deliuered it to the young King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeede; and sealed vp with the seale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands vpon two Romane Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, vnder one Clondicus a petty King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gauls, which were were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarne. These had before-hand made their bargain, and were to receiue present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Capitaines to come visit him, whom he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to giue the souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Heere to the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy master, That the Gauls will not stirre one foote further, vntill they haue gold; as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus heereupon tooke counsaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men so¹⁰ against the inuicilitie and avarice of the Bastarne: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fie thousand horse of them, hee said would bee as manie as he should need to vse; and not so manie, that hee should need to feare them. It had bene well done, if any of his counsailors would haue told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Armie of them, since without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrabia, into Thessalie: where wasting the Country, and filling themselves with spoile, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, euen for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable service, whether they wonne any victorie, or not. This, and a great²⁰ deale more, might haue bene alledged, if any man had dared to giue aduice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had bene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmur of those many thousands that had bene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those five thousand, whom the King would entertaine. Heere to, when it was perceived, that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shuffling excuses; the Bastarne returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape unhurt: which was more than hee could haue well expected.

³⁰ Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preferue his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painful Office he was very soone discharged by L. Aemilius Paulus the new Consul: who in fiftene dayes after his setting forth from Italie, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed ouer it a King so foolish and so cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Aemilius Paulus the Consul. His journey. He forceth Perseus to discompe: He will not hazard battaile with anie disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moone. Aemilius his superstition. The Battaille of Pydna. Perseus his flight. He forsakes his Kingdome: which hastily yields to Aemilius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yeelds himselfe to the Romane Admirall, and is sent prisoner to Aemilius.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity so⁵⁰ moued them, that either they decreed that Prouince to L. Aemilius Paulus, Plutar. in vit. Emil. without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him and his fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that so worthy a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. Hee refused to propound vnto the Senate any thing that concerned his Prouince; vntill by his Embassadors, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderstood, in what condition both the Romane forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly knowento be such, as hath bene already told; the Senate appointed a strong supply, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Naue; and likewise to the Armie that lay betweene Illyria and Epirus; from which App. Clondicus was remooued, and L. Aemilius sent thither in his place. Aemilius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that did thinke themselves wise enough enough to manage this Warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to gouern their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by hearefay, and censure by idle reports: for hee told them plainly, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Amilius, who did valiantly in the Battaille of Canna, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wife and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Amilius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his iourney; with an especiall hope of men, that hee should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more then it could haue bene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium: whence, when the wind came faire, he set saile at break of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Cercyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in five dayes more. So are there our five of the fifteene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus by strongly encamped at Dium; hauing spared no labor of men and of women to fortifie the banks of Empus, wherein was fordable in drie weather: So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium; was lacke of fresh water. For there were ten miles betwene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betwene the Sea shore and the foote of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Amilius found present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not about the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging any neerer to the enemy, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the riuer of Peneus; where hee had warred at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of any worth. Yet while the Romane Campe had such meanes to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did; the passage onward being defended as hath bene already shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by equirie was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire iourney. Martius cyther had not bene informed heretof; or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the aduerture; they fearing lest it would proue such a peece of worke as had bene their march our Offa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and abilitie, to command. Hee had reformed, euen at his first coming, many disorders in the Romane Campe: reaching the souldiers among many other good lessons, to bee obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had bene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now hee appointed about five thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Emilianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabij. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darknesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the Fleet; where victuals were provided for their iourney: it being noyed, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where he lay, rather to diuert the Kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Channell of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-well-neare all drie, yet it serued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Emilius employed none save his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Tower which Perseus had rayled on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Emilius persisted as hee had begunne; and continued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might haue serued to reach the Macedonians, that some greater worke was in hand: since otherwise a good Captaine, as Amilius was knowne to bee, would not haue troubled himselfe with making such brauadoes, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully down the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed then any of the rest. Order was forthwith giuento to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedy retreat madeto Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force; Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their iourney. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came somewhat neere to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrowes and slings could doe little seruice, were beaten at handie-strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, & an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them haue bene true. Thus was an open way cleered into Macedon: which had bin effected by Martius in the yeere fore-going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting for such an opportunitie.

Perseus was in an extreame doubt what course to take, after this vnhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre; hauing bene taught by the last yeeres example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But faire worse counsaile preuailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King relucd to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselfe into any one Towne, lest that should be first of all besieged; and hee therein (as cowardly natures alwaies are icalous) not ouer-carefully relieved. This was euen the same that Amilius, or anie inuader, should haue desired. So a place was chosen neere vnto Pydna, that serued well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There hee abode the comming of the enemy, who stayed not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than discretion, had hastied away from them, forsaking the Campe that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately: doubting lest otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul, praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Amilius told him, That he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their iourney; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe measured out & entrenched behinde the Armie; wherein, at good leysure, hee fell backe, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, hee excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemy, who aduanced no further, but kept vpon ground seruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That euening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeere bene Prætor, foretold vnto the Consul, and (with his good liking) vnto the Armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to bee the same night: willing the souldiers not to bee troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might bee knowne long before it was sene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Brasse and Basons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, wherein they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not heere stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause any alteration in ciuill affaires, and matters that haue small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of obseruation it is, how superstition captiuates the vnderstanding of the wisest, where the helpe of true religion is wanting. Amilius, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor about the reach of humane vnderstanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with any deuout regard therof: yet could he not refrain from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with sacrifice her deliuerie, as soone as she shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not afflit him in this foolish deuotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senator, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainly consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any Sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good lucke in the entrails of the beafts. At length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was so found a promise of victorie to Amilius; but with condition. That hee should not giue the oncke. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as neerer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Romane. Wherefore it had bene better to call vpon the new goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Cite, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authentically) vpon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore would haue limited his fauour, with no injunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaille; Amilius was throughly perswaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would not haue stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leysure serued to retire whither hee listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that he might wait vpon aduantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romanes faces: which would bee much to their hindrance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Amilius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likely hood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer-earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering: which two or three of the Romane souldiers followed into the riuer, wading after him vpon to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the Water, to draw this horse ouer to their owne side. These felto blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slaine. His Countymen seeing this, hastied to reuenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the riuer. Heere vpon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaille, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the Armes, wherewith they serued, did require. The ground was a flatte leuell, saue that on the sides a few hillockes were raised heere and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifullly afford. But the King hauing finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the lesse maruaile, that hee durst aduventure battaille, since hee had bethought himselfe of such a stratageme, whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, hee liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whole vnreasonable deuotion could bee no better than hypocritic. For hee that will pray for a good good Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaille, hee found it no better than lost: and he, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, such as wee find recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse onwards; and beat off all which came before it, as Amilius was thereat much astonished; That the Pelagians rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them slaine, and the squadrons following them so discouraged herewith as they retired apacetowards an hill. These were the things that fell out aduerse to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to haue rent his coat-armor for grieue. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his deuoyre, the victorie might haue bene his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaille, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost the impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilst some of the Romans small battallions pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessary: (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worse) that some files should use open way before them, should aduance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This coming so to passe, admonished the Consul, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vse, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction giuen by Amilius, when hee saw the front of the Enemies great battaille become vnequall, and the ranks in some places open; by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vse of the Phalanx proued vnauailable against many small squadrons, as had bene formerly in the battaille of Cynoscephale: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnseruicable against the other, by reason, that being not euery where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe; though heere were little such incommenience of ground, as had bene at Cynoscephale.

Perseus, when hee saw his battaille begin to rouse, turned his bridle presently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing the little good seruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercy of the Enemie: who slew about twenty thousand of them; though hauing little cause to beforious, as hauing lost, in that battaille, onely some fourescore, or sixescore men at the most. Some of the foote, escaping from the execution, ouertooke the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to rayling at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traitors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blows. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: euery one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For hee fell to deuising vpon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrinke away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella; hee found his Pages and household seruants, ready to attend him, as they had bene wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaille, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults: But in reward of their vnseasonable admonitions, hee stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischief: he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends hee had with him only Euander (who had bin employed to kill Ennius at Delphi) and two other. These followed him likewise about 500. Cretians; more for loue of his money than of him. To these hee gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie Talents, though shortly hee coozened them of some part thereof; making them as if hee would haue redeemed it; but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaille hee came to Amphipolis; where hee exhorted the Towne-men to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to speake what himselfe would haue uttered. But the Amphipolians made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselves.

Vpon

Vpon the first fame of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them forth vnder color of a iust employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to be ridde of the King; they plainly bad Euander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine vessels that hee found in the riuer Strymon; passed ouerto the Ile of Samosbrace: where he hoped to liue safe, by priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the Kingdome fell into the power of Amilius, within a few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was neere at hand, was the last that yielded. About sixe thousand of the souldiours, 10 that were of sundry Nations, fledde out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippius who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had bene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Ilyrian, were the first that came in: yielding themselves and the Towne of Bereas, whither they had retired out of the battell. With the like mesage came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole body of all sense and strength. Neyther did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such termes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Romane Armie. Amilius sent abroad into the Countrey, such 20 as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Ilyrian. But within a very little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samosbrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. Hee sent these letters by person of such meane condition; that his case was pitied, for that hee wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in termes ill becoming a King; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and 30 would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to confere with him about matters of his present estate. Neuerthelesse, in this conference, hee was marvellous earnest, that hee might bee allowed still to retaine the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preferred his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his desire to liue at ease, and to bee called King. 40 Yea it seemes that hee had indeede, euens from the beginning, a desire to liue in this Ile of Samosbrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the Warre, hee was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for such a paltry Iland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. Theyurge him to giue place vnto necessity, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samosbrace Cn. Octavius the Romane Admirall, with his fleet: who assyes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, 50 hee had now already imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serue, a question was moued to the Samosbracians: How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like priuiledge of Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samosbracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, That Euander, who liues with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleare himselfe in iudgement, hee must nor be suffer'd to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Maestie, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with

with the same crime. But what will this auile, when the minister of the fact being brought into iudgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perseus therefore 10 willd Euander to haue consideration of the little fauour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be preiudents and ouerscers of this iudgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, since none other hope remains, than hope to make good any cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Euander seemes to like well: and either kils himselfe; or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poison wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandment. The death of this man, who had stucke to Perseus in all times of 10 needs, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leaue him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priuiledge of this holy Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gainesay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that also lyable to dispute, which preserues him from captiuitie; he purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto 20 Cory: his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samosbrace with one ship; who easily was perswaded to wist the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could be so conueyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himselfe, 30 with his wife and children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him onely * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by ropes, and ouer a muddle wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian trick, and he was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest he should be taken; he hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne vp and downe making enquire; till Octavius made Proclamation, That all 40 the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their master in Samosbrace, should haue their liues and libertie, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Ile, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had giuen the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samosbrace that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victory compleate. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samosbrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of liuing, than of reigning therein; he might well haue brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by diuiding his cogitations, and pursuing, 50 at once, those contrary hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes; that haue bene wretched by their owne default. He was presently sent away to Amilius; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abiect qualitie, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. Amilius vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for hauing, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answer might haue bene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearful silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul feared it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercie of the people of Rome. After these 10 good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, and respectfully entreated, he was committed prisoner to Q. Aelius.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after foure yeers continuance: and such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

Genius, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

ABout the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius; had the like successe against King Genius the Illyrian. Genius had an Armie of fifteene thousand, with which hee was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soone as the money should come, whereof he had receiued onely ten Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him, ouercame him, and draue him into * Scodra. This Towne was very defensible by nature, besides the helpe of fortification, and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, 10 assisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme vnpossible to be wonne, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victory; and therefore persecuted his Armie before the walles, making countenance to giue an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily haue defended themselves within the Towne, would needes issue forth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadours, by whom, at first, he desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadours, to haue recourse to such mediation. But he thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadours into prison; where they were still alieue. Having obtained three dayes respite, he passed vp a Riuer, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Carauantius was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He sent Messengers crauing access vnto the Prætor: before whom hauing lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) he fell downe humbly, and yielded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, friends, were presently giuen vp. 30 So this Warre ended in thirte dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun, vntill Perenna, one of the Embassadours that had bene imprisoned, brought word from Anicius; how all had passed.

Sparta.

How the Romans behaued themselves in Greece and Macedon after their victory ouer Perseus.

NOW began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to look tyrannically vpon those that had bene vnmanly toward them before, whilst the Warre with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadours were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with a bad grace; saying, that they were sent from Rhodes to make an ouerture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no lesse grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had bene expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for loue of Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (courageous of the charge) to haue Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning apparel, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had bene any any whit auerle from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that sue themselves for feare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would haue done, if olde M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vntied a milde sentence, and aduersified the Senate, That in decreeing Warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedy to ransacke, than any iust cause, had moued them thereto. This consideration, together with their good desires in the Warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any marke remained alieue, saue those that had 10 bene of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many yeeres passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the societie of the Romans: a fauour which till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselves better without it, as equall friends.

With the like, or greater seueritie, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Æmilius himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them vnderstand what power he had ouer them. More than six hundred of the chiefe Citizens in Demetrius were slaine at one time by those of the Roman faction; and with helpe of the Roman soldiours. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, 20 when complaint was made to the Consul, the redresse was such, as required not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, he cast like a King, with excessive cheere, yet so, that he had all things very cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadours likewise were sent from Rome, some to giue order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was vsuall in such cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was set at liberty by Æmilius and the Embassadours, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was, That the 30 Tribute which had bene payed vnto the Kings, was lessened by halfe. As for the rest; the Countrey was diuided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobilitie were sent captiue into Italy, with their wiues and children, as many as were about fifteene yeeres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new giuen by Æmilius. Such mischiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Prouince, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue any unconuenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subiects to Rome; the things done to them could deferre no better name than meere tyrannie, yea and shamelesse perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the 40 Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadours that were sent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from euery quarter, as had any way discovered an vnseruiceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subiects, yet wanted there no colour, for visting them as traitors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for hauing bene openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achaens these Embassadours were to deale more formally; 50 not so much because that Common-wealth was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, hauing no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue vntenable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of signe, by letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achaens could be suspiciously charged to haue held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callistratus, nor any of his adherents, had bene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their seruice to the Romans, but onely such as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadours neglect to vse the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season serued fitly to ranke the Achaens with the rest.

And

Caes. inuicte.
Apud Salust. de Conuict. Ca-
tilinae.

And hereto Calliocrates was very vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, he and his fellows should be made to pay for their mischieuous deuices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Achaens: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Calliocrates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perseus. This being so; he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence giuen, hee would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? Name them first, and let them answere; which if they cannot well doe, wee will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prators, as many as 10 had led their armies, were guiltie of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence; then should I likewise haue beene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall thoroughly answere him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassadour laid hold, and said that euens so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not well he had cited about a thousand; willing them to appeare and answere before the Senate. This might euen be tearmed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Countrey; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, 20 that vertue, and regard of the publike libertie, should dwell together in any of the Greekes. At their coming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achaens. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honestie had been thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achaens, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answere it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrey, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any solicitation of the Achaens, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after seuentene yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom 30 that wife and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; or hauing made offer to scape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome; or whether out of stayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preferue the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiours, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Amphilus with mischieuous subtiltie. Having taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with 40 bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; he sent vnto the Epirots for ten of the principall men out of euery Citie. These he commanded to deliuer vp all the Gold and Silver which they had; and sent along with them, into euery of their Townes, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, euery one the Towne wherein he was sent. Thus in one day were threecore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoyled by the Roman Souldiours; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserved punishment, as hauing fauoured Perseus. 50 But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had beene already sent into Italie, thre to receiue their due; and since this Nation, in general, was not onely at the present in good obedience, but had euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleue it, had any one Writer deliuered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marueilous, that God was pleased to make Amphilus childlesse, euen in the glory of his triumph, how great soeuer otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greekes and Macedonians.

ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacye of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

The Warre of Antiochus vpon Agypt, brought to end by the Roman Embassadours.

Antiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his raigne and life. He died the sixe and thirtieth yeere after he had worne a Crowne, and in the seuenteenth or eighteenth of Ptolemie Epiphanes: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, (according to Iustine) of Iupiter. He left behinde him three sonnes, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom hee had giuen in marriage to Ptolemie Epiphanes, King of Agypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sonnes; reigned in Syria twelue yeeres, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpicius: though Iosephus giue him but seuen. A Prince, who as hee was flourishfull by nature; so the great losse which his father Antiochus had received, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gaue this iudgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissimus & indigenus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) shall start vp a wilde person, unworthy the honour of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of Onias the Priest, it came to passe, that euen the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King to leize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Maccabees take beginning. Which bookes seeme not to be deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yett hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successours, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successor of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabaeus (who died in the hundred threecore and leueneenth yeere of the Greekes in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second booke, although he take the storie somewhat further off, by way of a Proeme, yett he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Grecian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, slaine by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Iason the brother of 40 Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, preuailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Iansenius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadours to the Zewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betwene them and the Greekes, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Namenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereof Iosephus addes, that the name of the Lacedaemonian Embassadour was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding 50 a Dragon in her claws.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seuen and thirtieth yeere of the Greekes in Syria. He was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he usurped from his brothers sonne.

Ptolemie Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had beene about seuen yeeres King of Agypt.

Ptolemie Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Agypt foure and twenty yeeres; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his Kingdome betwene them, whilst he was a child. But they found such other businesse, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniuit purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Prouinces of Calestria, Phenice, and Iudea, which he had won by his victory ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Neuerthelesse, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby hee liued in the greater securitie. He left behinde him two sons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Physcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom shee was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, so called (that is, the lower of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subiects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdome, his younger brother being set vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, craving succour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vp on him the protection of the young Prince, fought by all means possible to possess himselfe of that Kingdome. He sent Apollonius the sonne of Mnesthemus Embassadour into Egypt, and vnder colour to assist the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouernours of the young King Philometor, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that Kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephews safety and well doing. And the better to answer all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came hee alongst the coast of Syria to Toppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Ierusalem, where, by Iason the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) he was with all pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessour of Epiphanes, that impious Traitour Simon of the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would haue deliuered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouernour of Calestria and Phenicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heauen; the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angell of God, and recouering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example 30 to terrifie others from the like vngodly practices. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threecore talents of siluer, with other rents and summes of money. So he got his desire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Iason, and his being ouer-reached by another in the same kinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achaens, when as that mischieuous Callistates, who had bene too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
One Wolfe than other Wolues does bite more sore;
One Hawke than other Hawkes more swift does fly.
So one most mischieuous of men before,
Callistates, false knaue as knaue might be,
Met with Menelidas more false than he.

And euen thus fell it out with Iason: who within three yeeres after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Iason thereupon being forced to flye from Ierusalem, 50 and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty armie of land-forces, He went about to raigne ouer Egypt, that he might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entered Egypt with a mighty company with, Chariots and Elephants, with Horsmen, and with a great Nauie, and moued warre against Ptolemæus King of Egypt: but Ptolemæus was afraid of him, and fled, or many were wounded to death. Ver 12. 13. 20. He won many strong Cities, and tooke away the spoiles of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled

Prophecie of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Prouinces, and he shall doe that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeede had any of the Kings of Syria to great a victory ouer the Egyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For he gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betwene Pellus. Hier. in Dan. sum and the hill Cassius, after which he entered, and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had snitten Egypt, he turned againe, and went vp towards Israel and Ierusalem with a mighty people, and entered proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Pouring Vessels, and the Rolles, and the golden Basins, and the Vails and the Crowns, and the golden Apparell. He tooke also the Siluer and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when hee had taken away all, hee departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Calestria, iustifying his title by the same allegations which his father had made; and thirstily auctring, that this Prouince had not bene consigned ouer to the Egyptian, or giuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achaens, Rhodiens, Athenians, and other of the 20 Greekes, pressed him, by seuerall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard piece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine warre, than by the terror of his armes, threatening destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leaving the Ptolemies in very weak estate, the younger almost ruined by his inuasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weak soeuer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, 30 that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him awhile at Antioch, and then made a iourney into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochus. For Gouernour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iason out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof hee presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and 40 sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioyning. This hee did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Stratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossest by Iason) had certaine knowledge, being moued with zeale, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, he reproofed him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adioyning as a suburb to Antioch. In compass it had about ten miles: wherein werethe Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Groue, sweete Springs, banqueting places, and the like, which were wholly, in a manner, abused to 50 lust and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priuiledge, from the holinesse of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Oncely I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is farre lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to iudge this fearefull shift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore old man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when hee came to Onias, hee counselled him craftily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswaded him to come out of the Sanctuary; so hee slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousness. Hereof 7 zzzz when when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, He tooke away Andronicus his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led through out the Citie, and in the same place where he had committed the wickedesse against Onias, he was slain as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolemie, a Traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, hee condemned innocent men to death; who iustly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Esymachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outrageous will, and not by any regard of iustice: since hee reuenged the death of Onias, yet hee thole that were in the same cause with Onias; who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should have bene heard as innocent. By reason of such his vnited iustice, this King was commonly termed Epimaneus, that is, mad, in stead of Epiphaneus, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there scene throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem forty daies long, horsemen running in the ayre with robes of gold, and as bands of Spear-men, and as troupes of Horse-men set in array, encountering and courting one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of God, all Histories haue deliuered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a starre in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heavens directly over the Citie, after which there followed a slaughter like vnto this of Epiphaneus, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny tels vs, that Armies were scene fighting in the ayre from the morning till the evening.

In the time of Pope Jehus the cleuenth, a fountaine powred out blood in stead of water, in or neare the Citie of Genoa; soone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vigera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the Off-spring of the Cæsars, as well naturall as adopted, tooke end; whereof this notable signe gaue warning.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Hen, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Hen came a faire increase of white Poultry; and from the little Branch there sprang vp in time a Groue of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vnto carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Groue; & after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were obserued, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hens died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Zones did not thinke such strange signes to be unworthy of regard; it appears by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Vncle, thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by arms. Physcon had not yet forgotten the terrour of the former siege: the Alexandriners though they loved not Philometor, yet loved they worse to liue in scarcity of victuals (which was already great among them, and liketo grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother had no likelihood or good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helps, and above all these, the loving disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein hee stood of his Vncle. For though Antiochus were gone out of Egypt with his armie, yet had he left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusi, retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne vife. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subiect his younger brother vnto him, which hee gaue in answer to all Embassadours; yet hee now prepared to make a sharpe warre vpon them both. And to this end hee presently furnished and sent out his Naue towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Calofrya, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocornea, he met with Embassadours sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeldethankes to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather be pleased to signifie what hee required to haue done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That hee would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands together with the Citie of Pelusi, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that hee should also abandon and leaue vnto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for euer. For answer vnto these demands, hee set downe a day certaine, and a shote one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Memphis, and all about it, receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie iourneyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or, were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the iust cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Nevertheless, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing ioynly in neede of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefites should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had bene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither come, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian, had Aratus laide the foundation of that greatesse, whereto the Achaens attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes bene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requitt: but with continuance of sitable beneficence, from time to time increased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde, especially to the Rhodians and Achaens, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yere since: but their Embassadours lay still in Rome. Of the Achaens they desired in particular, that Lycortas the braue warriour might be sent vnto them; as General of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius, General of the Horse. Herunto the Achaens readily consented: and would immediately haue made performance, if Callicrates had not interposed his mischieuous art. Hee; whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiounesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce, which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be ayding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee said) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeelde vnto the Romans, what helpe sooner should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Marius

the late Consull had signified vnto him, that the Romans were past all neede of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well be spared, to the ayde of their Benefactors, the Aegyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any seruice to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand Souldiours. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should haue passed; he brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Marius; whereby the Acheans were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadours to set Aegypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeede sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybus and his friends, durst not gaine-say the Roman Council; which had force of an iniunction. So the Kings were left in much distresse, disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassadour sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had beene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto those Embassadours of Physcon and Cleopatra; which hauing flayed more then a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their businesse to effect vntill now. The Embassadors deliuered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no lesse than his Brother and Sister.

In this ambassage of Ptolemy, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had beene before three or foure yeeres last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Vvaire; either he, or Eulaus, or Lentus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layd) which had the gouernment of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not onely hee determined to set vpon Antiochus, for Calestria; but would haue interposed himselfe betwene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embassadour was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts he fell on the sudd-n, by the rebellion of his brother and subiects, to liue vnder protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subiects, he might haue seemed to stand in no neede of such protection, he hath remaining none other helpe whereby to saue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister, shewed it selfe, euén in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorly clad; the haire of their heads and beards outgrowne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Olive. Thus they entred into the Senate; and there fell, grousling and prostrate vpon the floore. Their garments were not so meane and mournfull, nor their looks and Countenances so sadde and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Country stood; they made a pittifull and grievous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to haue compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had alwaies remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vnder-taking vpon the King their Confederate; then would hee presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Armie out of Aegypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vied any delay; then should Ptolemy and Cleopatra, be shortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make reparaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lænis, C. Decimus, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the warre betwene those Kings. In commission they had first to finde King Ptolemy, and then Antiochus, and to let them both vnderstand, that vntill they surceased, and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and people of Rome, whom they found obdurate, or vying delay. So these Romans together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, tooke their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Aegypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neere was he to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadours met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius; but Popilius filled it with a Rolle of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and hauing a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadours their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which hee held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after hee had stayed and pawed awhile, I will be content (quoth hee) to doe whatsoever the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Aegypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; euén in such manner as Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling euery particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Jerusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather beene historified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadours, they stayed awhile, and setled the Kingdome of Aegypt, leaving it vnto the elder brother, and appointed the yonger to reigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they felt, as it had beene, in the power of the Aegyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already giuen an ouerthrow to the Aegyptian ships.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Mithridates, and Corys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Otho. With the Conclusion of the warre.

By this peremptorie demanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had beene well contented, a yeere before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Acheans and Asians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King of Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse vied any menacing tearmes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus; to gratulate the victory ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallio, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bade him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe, for it should sorely be giuen him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee either approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaimed by the faithfull counsaile of Stratus a Physician; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had beene sent, recounting his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre; where vntill hee forgot not to make of his brother as good mention as hee could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Enus and Maronea might be bestowed

⁶ Polyb. Legat. bestowed vpon himselfe. * By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him vnderstand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gaue to him (as was their custome to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Neuertheless, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italy, they gaue order for the libertie of Anus and Marones: thereby making vncertaine all their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Gallio, which were about to invade the Kingdome of Perseus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his second voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, hee had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne doores. No sooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to vse him as an enemy, that came to visit them in loue: neither could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of singular inconstancy: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where hee was well commended after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entering into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kissed the threshold, called the Fatirs his gods and fauours: as also hee vsed to weare a Cap, after the manner of slaves newly manumitted; professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. Hee was indeede naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flattery kept himselfe safe; though doing otherwise greater mischief than any wherewith Perseus had beene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement; to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whom hee brought with him to Rome; there to receiue education. Further petition hee made, to haue some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would haue beene vniust, hee receiued a cold answer. But concerning the Wardshippe of his sonne, it was vnder taken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Aegypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But aboute all other Kings, Masaniassa held his credit with the Romans good: His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue iudgement on his side: and whereas hee had invaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Towes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold; and to pay fine hundreded Talents to the Namidian, for hauing hindered him of his due so long. Now indeede had Rome good leysure to deuile vpon the ruine of Carthage; after which, the race of Masaniassa himselfe was shortly by them rooted vp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreamed. Hee sent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victory ouer Perseus; and offered to come thither himselfe, there to sacrifice for loy vnto Iupiter in the Capitol. His good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreated to stay at home.

Corys the Thracian sent Embassadors, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him giuen to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to entreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at libertie for conuenient ranfome. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giuing hostages, without necessity: Yet was his sonne giuen backe to him ranfome-free; with admonition, to carry himselfe better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay betwene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those vnhappy Kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were led through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Emilius and Antius. Perseus had often made suite to Emilius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but hee still receiued one skornfull answer, That it lay in his owne power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himselfe. And surely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee found, he would rather haue sought his death in Macedon, than haue bin beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemencie; whereof Emilius had giuen him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had bene led in chaynes through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison; whereto they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe sacrifice, he should command the captiues to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honor of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were overcome, might be both together at the vtmost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Perseus; yet so, that he had little ioy of his life; but eyther famished himselfe, or (for it is diuerly reported) was kept watching person by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sons, two died; it is vncertaine how. The yongest called Alexander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a loyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe vnder the Roman Officers. In such pouertie ended the Royall Houle of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eight-score yeeres after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had knowne it before, that his owne sonne should one day be compelled to earne his liuing by handie-wooke, in a painefull Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Soueraignie, haue commanded those poore men to be slaine, which had recouered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diuing. Hee would rather haue bene verie gentle, and would haue considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most vnderroden wretches, are all subiect vnto the One high Power, governing all alike with absolute command. But such is our vnhappy nature; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as ye would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; we entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath saith truly:

Possit volunt* —

*Tuoual. Sat.
10.*

Even they that haue no murderous will,
Would haue it in their power to kill.

40. All, or the most, haue a vaine desire of abilitie to do euill without controule; which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. God, who best can iudge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that vse it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by lacking his Soueraigne authorities to the vtmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other necessitie in blood, be diuined to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that gouernes one, the most unworthie of his whole house, yet reigning ouer all? The vtmost death of many Princes which could not humble themselves to such flattery; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes heereof. Heereunto may be added, That the Emperour of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traitorously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heere apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemy, to exercise the same vpon the Line of that vnhappy King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subiect;

subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happye that Countreie, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach, That * God is the forest and sharpest Schoolmaster that can be deuised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without conuolment to turne it upside-downe as their pleasure.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Aemilius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyle; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Siluer carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasure, that from thenceforth, vntill the ciuill Wars which followed vpon the death of Iulius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue bin hindered by the fouldiors; who grudged at their General, for not hauing dealt more bountifullly with them. But the Princes of the Senate ore-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by seuerall exhortations. Thus Paulus enioyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuerthelesse, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died fide daies before the Triumph; the other three daies after it. This losse he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the ioy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About the same time, Othanius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace; and Anticus the Prator, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their iourall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles; together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enough to say vnto Rome, Sume superbiam, Take vpon thee the Maiesie, that thy deserts haue purchased.

BY this which wee haue already set downe, is scene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world, whereof the Founders and Erectors thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. Wee haue left it flourishing in the middle of the field; hauing rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaues shall fall off; her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, haue bin the subiect of those ancient Histories, which haue bin preferred, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of so many tragicall Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mighty men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, these great Lords of the world haue beene stirred vp; rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire; and bloweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it, so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cicero to Pyrrhus pitties. And certainly, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the lining; so is it to the dead of no vse at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreame ill bargain of buying this lasting discourse, vnderstood by them which are dissolued; they themselves would then rather haue wished, to haue stioe out of the world without noyse; than to be put in minde, that they haue purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and crueltie: by going in spoyle the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many, and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes; which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath beene no State fearefull in the East, but that of

of the Turk; nor in the West any Prince that hath spred his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expell'd the Moors out of Granado, haue made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdomes which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoysed by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as haue beene spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defenseiue Warre, and in diuersions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeeres, or three at the most, they may not onely be perswaded to liue in peace, but all their swelling and ouer-flowing streames may bee brought backe into their naturall channels and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one seeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof; the one to ioyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundlesse ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath beene already said; That the Kings and Princes of the world haue alwaies laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwaies transported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miserie of the other, till they finde the experience in themselves. They neglect the aduice of God, while they enioy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is hee that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is beleueed; God, which hath made him and loues him, is alwaies deferred. I haue considered (saith Salomon) all the workes that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, and vexation of spirit; but who beleuees it, till Death tells it vs? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the first, made him enioyne his sonne Philip to restore Nauarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that iustice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepassed happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, iust, and mighty Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou onely hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre stretched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hic iacet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calls it selfe, The first part of the General Historie of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and haue hewne out, besides many other discouragements, perswading my silence; it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspokeable and neuer enough lamented losse, hath taught me to say with Iob, Versa est in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in uocem fletum.

To the Reader.

The use of Chronological Tables is needfull to all Histories, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: since they cannot, like Annales, yearly set downe all Occurrences not coherent. This booke following, may serue as an Index to the present Part of this worke; pointing vnto the severall matters, that hauing fallen out at one time, are farre disioyned in the Relation. Certainly it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that any can be. For howeuer the yeares of the first Patriarchs may seeme to have been well nere complete, yet in the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, we finde many fractions, and the last yeere, or yeeres, of one King reckoned also as the formost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many other; though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the diuerse and imperfect formes of the yeere, which were in use among sundry Nations: causing the Summer Moneths, in proceesse of some ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding extreme confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse out of so many, and so widely disagreeing computations, as haue already gotten authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleged, in excuse of such errors as a more intente and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may serue to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane iudgement) from any notorious Anachronisme; which ought to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, even in that regard, not onely for some errors of the press, in the numbring of yeeres, but for some haste mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to haue hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The Titles ouer the Columnes, haue reference to that which followes vnder them; as will readily be conceiued. Where two Titles, or more, are ouer the head, as ^{Rome} ^{Nabonassar} there doe the numbers vnderneath answere proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ierusalem were finished in the 319. yeere from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be vnderstood, That Iehosaphat began his reigne in the 3774. of the Iulian Era, in the 3092. of the World, or in the 99. yeere of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with works of this kinde. To auoid prolixitie, I haue forborne to insert those yeeres, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Reigne; some change of Gouvernement; some Battaille fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeeres wherein Sylluius Capetus reigned ouer the Latines, I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betwene the 4. of Iehosaphat, wherein Capetus began, vnto the 17. wherein Sylluius Auentinus succeeded, and wherein Iehoram first reigned with Iehosaphat his father. For I thought it vaine to haue filled up a page with 12 lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2. 3. 4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Auentinus, and the 17. of Iehosaphat. In setting downe the Kings, there is noted ouer the head of euery one, what place he held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fift, (euenth, or so forth, in ranke, of those that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeere of his reigne; at the end, or foot of the name (as the space guesse leaue) is the whole number of yeeres in which he reigned; in the spaces following vnderneath are those yeeres of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeere of any remarkable accident.

To the Reader.

Concerning the Æra, or accompt of yeeres, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been said, where due place was, in the Booke itselfe: so as it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeere of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his reigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeere thereof.

The Julian Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the yeeres of the World, was delivered by that honorable and excellently learned Ioseph Scaliger, being accommodated to the Iulian yeeres, now in use among vs. It consisteth of 7890, yeeres, which result from the multiplicatio of 19, 28, & 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the yeeres of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaveth the number of the present yeere, or if no fraction remaine, it shewes the last yeere of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498, of this period, when was fought the great battaile of Cannæ, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun 18, & consequently the Dominical letter F, as may be found by dividing the same number of the Iulian Period 4498, by 19, for the Prime, by 28, for the Cycle of the Sunne. This Iulian Period, after the present account, alwayes exceeds the yeeres of the world by 682. Besides the former uses, and other thence redounding in a better Character of a yeere, than any other Æra (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain position.
